PREFACE

TO THE THIRD EDITION

WHEN this work first appeared, in 1897, the only criticism which the author observed among the many columns of press notices was that he would have done well to refrain for a few years from writing about the Church he had abandoned. The painful experiences which are recorded in its later chapters would not unnaturally suggest that the book must have been written in an embittered mood. The implication was, however, inaccurate, and when, in 1903, a second edition was prepared, after the work had been out of print for five years, very little change was needed. The author had had the good fortune, on leaving the Church, to come under the genial influence of Sir Leslie Stephen, and had endeavoured to write in the mood of "good-natured contempt," which the great critic recommended to him. Neither in this nor in any subsequent work of his will there be found any justification for the petulant Catholic complaint that the author writes with "bitterness" or "hatred" of the Roman Church.

The truth is that, on re-reading the book after an interval of nine years, for the purpose of preparing a popular edition, the moderation of its temper somewhat surprises the author. The reader may judge for himself whether the system depicted in the following pages has been harshly judged in the few phrases of censure which have been admitted into the work. The author himself looks back with astonishment on features of that system which had almost faded from his memory, and is amazed to think that such a system still commands the nominal allegiance of large numbers of educated men and refined women. The Rome of history we all know—the Rome which retained the bandage of ignorance about the eyes of Europe for a thousand years, and, while exhibiting a spectacle of continuous and unblushing immorality in its most sacred courts, employed the rack and the stake to intimidate any man who would venture to impugn its sanctity or its truth. But there is a widespread feeling that the Reformation chastened the Church of Rome, and that at least in the nineteenth and twentieth century it has ground, whatever its superstitions, to claim to be one of the greatest spiritual forces in the world.

This description of the Roman system by one who had intimate experience of it for many years, written with cold impartiality at a time when every feature was still fresh in his memory, must give ground for reflection to those who would grant Catholicism some strange preference over the Reformed Christian Churches. The work is not an indictment, but a simple description. A distinguished London priest once told the author that it had had a considerable influence in checking the flow of “converts” from the English to the Roman Church. To such “movements of population” the author is genially indifferent. His aim was solely to present to those who were interested a candid account of intimate Roman Catholic life and of the author's career as monk, priest, and professor; and the constant circulation of the book fifteen years after its first publication, no less than the cordial welcome extended to it by men so diverse as Sir John Robinson, Sir Walter Besant, Dr. St. George Mivart, and Mr. Stead, have encouraged the author to think that it was interesting in substance and moderate in temper. Yet, when he looks back upon that system across sixteen years' experience of "worldly life"—to use the phrase of his monastic days—he is disposed to use a harsher language in characterising its profound hypocrisy and its wilful encouragement of delusions. More than sixteen years ago the author looked out, timidly and anxiously, from the windows of a monastery upon what he had been taught to call, with a shudder, "the world"—the world into which an honest change of convictions now forced him. He has found a sweeter and happier life, and finer types of men and women, in that broad world, and now looks back with a shudder on the musty, insincere, and oppressive life of the cloister from which he was happily delivered.

Yet the temptation to add a censorious language to the book shall be resisted. It remains, in its third edition, a cold and detached depictment of modern monasticism, and of so much of the inner life of the Roman clergy as came within the author's knowledge. Considerable revision was needed in preparing the book for the wider public to which it now appeals, but this has consisted only in some literary correction of the juvenility of the original and the substitution for certain technical passages of material of more general interest. Here and there the text has been brought up to date, but the author must confess to a certain indifference to the fortunes of the Church of Rome which prevents him from bringing it entirely up to date. The fiction of the Catholic journalist, that the author hovers about the fringes of the Church in some mysterious eagerness to assail it, is too ludicrous for words; and the grossly untruthful character and low cultural standard of such Catholic publications (especially of the "Catholic Truth Society") as are occasionally sent to him, on account of their lurid references to himself, deter him from taking such interest in Romanist literature as he should like to take. The work must, therefore, be regarded as a plain statement of personal experience, which, in the fifteen years of its circulation, has attracted considerable and most virulent abuse, but no serious criticism.

TWELVE YEARS IN A MONASTERY

CHAPTER I

INTRODUCTION

MONASTICISM, inseparable as it is from every advanced religious system, seems to be a direct outgrowth from the fundamental religious idea. The great religions of Asia, Europe, and America, despite their marked differences in conceiving the ultimate objects of religious belief, and the distinct racial and territorial influences that have affected them, have been equally prolific in monastic institutions; they seem to have been evoked by the story which is common to them all. Nor is it strange that that story inspired such an abdication of earthly joys as the monastic system embodies. If philosophers have, on their cold reasonings, been led to despise the changeful forms for the enduring realities they thought they perceived, it is not strange that religion should have taught the same theme with yet deeper effect. Men gazed on the entrancing vision of a world beyond, until the attitude of hope and expectancy satisfied them even now. In the hermit's cell or in the cloistered abbey they withdrew from earth and awaited the removal of the veil.

But the religious mind has entered upon a more troubled phase of its development. Physical and economical science have drawn its attention more eagerly to its present home; a growing self-consciousness has made it more critical and reflective; the outlines of the eternal city are once more fading. The vision has lost all the sharpness of outline and the warmth of colour that once made it so potent an agency in human life. The preacher must speak more of "the city of men," and be less disdainful of its interests and pleasures. The age of martyrs, the age of Crusaders, the age of public penance, or even of private mortification, must hope for no revival. The sterner dictates of the older supernaturalism must be explained away as unsuited to our more energetic age, or as a blunder on the part of a less enlightened generation.

Hence when, a few years ago, Dr. St. George Mivart confessed that he looked forward to a revival of the religious orders of the thirteenth century, he was greeted with a smile of incredulity outside the narrow sphere of his own co-religionists. Monasticism was dying—not in the odour of sanctity. Men visited the venerable ruins of abbeys and monasteries, and re-peopled in spirit the deserted cells and dreary cloisters and roofless chapel with a kindly archæological interest; smiled at their capacious refectories and wine-cellars; dwelt gratefully on the labours of the Benedictines through the Age of Iron; conjured up the picturesque life and fervent activity of the Grey Friars before their corruption; and shuddered at the zeal of the White Friars in Inquisition days. But people would as soon have thought to see the dead bones of the monks re-clothed with flesh as to see any great revival of their institutions. France and Portugal have already expelled the monks for ever; Italy and Spain will probably follow their example within the next twenty years. And how could one expect them to prosper in the lands of the Reformers?

In point of fact, however, there has been a revival of monastic institutions in England, Germany, and the United States proportionate to the revival of Roman Catholicism. A hundred years ago England flattered itself that the monastic spirit—if not Popery itself—was extinguished for ever within its frontiers: the few survivors of the old orders were still proscribed, and crept stealthily about the land in strange disguises. Then the French refugees surreptitiously reintroduced it, just as they brought over large quantities of the hated “popish baubles” in their huge boxes, which, on the king’s secret instructions, passed the custom-house untouched. The long Irish immigration set in, and the zeal of the aliens kept pace with growing British tolerance. The removal of Catholic disabilities, the Oxford movement, and the establishment of the hierarchy followed in quick succession, and, as Catholicism spread rapidly through the land, the Continental branches of the monastic orders grasped the opportunity of once more planting colonies on the fruitful British soil.

At the present day every order is represented in England and America, and the vast army of monks and nuns is tens of thousands strong. The expulsions from France and Portugal are increasing the number yearly. From train and road one sees the severe quadrangular structures springing up on the hillsides and in the quiet valleys as in days of old. Any important ecclesiastical function in England or the States attracts crowds of monks in their quaint mediæval costumes. After three long centuries they have started from their graves, and are walking amongst us once more.

It is true that the fact is not wholly realised outside their own sphere, for the monks have fallen under the law of evolution. The Benedictine does not now bury himself with dusty tomes far from the cities of men; he is found daily in the British Museum and nightly in comfortable hotels about Russell Square. The Grey Friar, erstwhile (and at home even now) bareheaded and barefooted, flits about the suburbs in silk hat and patent leather boots, and with silver-headed cane. The Jesuit is again found everywhere, but in the garb of an English gentleman. Still, whatever be their inconsistency, they come amongst us with the old profession, the archaic customs and costumes, of their long-buried brethren.

Their reappearance has provoked several controversies of some interest. When the monks last vanished from the stage in England they left behind them a dishonourable record which their enemies were not slow to publish. Are modern monasteries and convents the same whited sepulchres as their predecessors, on whom the scourge of the Reformation fell so heavily? A strong suspicion is raised against them by their former history; the suspicion is confirmed by a number of "escaped" monks and nuns who have traversed the land proclaiming that such is the case, and it is not allayed by the impenetrable secrecy of modern monastic life.

One of the least satisfactory features of the controversy that has arisen is that the disputants on both sides are, as a rule, entirely ignorant of the true condition of monasteries. The Catholic layman, to whom the task of defending them is usually committed, generally knows little more of the interior and régime of English monasteries than he does of those of Thibet. The monks preserve the most jealous secrecy about their inner lives; their constitutions strictly forbid them to talk of domestic matters to outsiders, and their secular servants are enjoined a like secrecy with regard to the little that falls under their observation. Roman Catholics who live under the very shadow of monasteries for many years are usually found, in spite of a most ardent curiosity, to be completely ignorant of the ways of conventual life. The Protestant is, of course, not more enlightened. And it must be stated that the pictures offered to the public by impartial and liberal writers are not wholly trustworthy. Sir Walter Besant once described to me a visit of his to a Benedictine monastery for the purpose of giving colour to his "Westminster." The life was very edifying; the fathers had, of course, been "sitting for their portrait." I remember an occasion when Dr. Mivart spent twenty-four hours at our Franciscan monastery for the purpose of describing our life in one of the magazines. We were duly warned of his coming, and the portrait he drew of us was admirable.

In such circumstances there is, perhaps, occasion for an ex-monk to contribute his personal experiences. The writer, after spending twelve years in various monasteries of the Franciscan Order, found himself compelled in the early part of 1896 to secede from the Roman Catholic priesthood. During those years he acquired a large experience of Catholic educational, polemical, and administrative methods, and of the monastic life, and it may not be inopportune to set it forth in simple narrative.

The religious Order to which I belonged is a revival of the once famous Province of Grey Friars, the English section of the Order of St. Francis. At the beginning of the thirteenth century, immediately after the foundation of the Order, Agnellus of Pisa successfully introduced it into England. Even after the Reformation a few friars lived in the country in disguise until the nineteenth century. Then occurred the remarkable change in the fortunes of the Church of Rome. The very causes which were undermining the dominion of the Papacy in Italy, Spain, and France—the growth of a sceptical and critical spirit, and the broadening of the older feeling for dogma—reopened England and Germany, and opened the United States, to the Roman missionaries. The Belgian and French friars quickly planted colonies in England, and the German and Italian provinces (each national branch of the Order is called “a province”) founded the Order of St. Francis in the United States. The dispersion of the Irish Catholics through the English-speaking world coincided in quite a dramatic fashion with the new opportunity, and before the end of the nineteenth century the Franciscans had become fairly numerous.

Other monastic orders and religious congregations advanced with the same rapidity. The Jesuit Society has enjoyed its customary prosperity : the Benedictine, Dominican, Carmelite, and Carthusian Orders are also well represented, together with the minor congregations—Passionists, Marists, Redemptorists, Oblates, Servites, &c., and the infinite variety of orders and congregations of women. In the following pages I shall give such items of interest concerning them (and the Church of Rome at large) as may have fallen under my experience. As the narrative follows, for the sake of convenience, the course of the writer's own life, it is necessary to commence with the means of recruiting the religious orders and the clergy in general.

VOCATION

IN an earlier age the "vocation" to a monastic life was understood to have an element of miracle, and there are psychologists of our time who affect at least to find a fascinating problem in the religious "conversion." It may be said at once that the overwhelming majority of calls to the monastic life have not the least interest in either respect. The romantic conversions of the days of faith are rare events in our time. Monasteries and nunneries are no longer the refuges of converted sinners, of outworn debauchees, of maimed knights-errant, or of betrayed women. One does not need the pen of a Huysman to describe the soul en route to the higher life of the religious world. The classes from which monasticism draws its adherents to-day are much less romantic, and much less creditable, it must be confessed.

Nine-tenths of the religious and clerical vocations of the present day are conceived at the early age of fourteen or fifteen. As a general rule the boy is fired with the desire of the priesthood or the monastery precisely as he is fired with the longing for a military career. His young imagination is impressed with the dignity and the importance of the priest's position, his liturgical finery, his easy circumstances, his unusually wide circle of friends and admirers. The inconveniences of the office, very few of which he really knows, are no more formidable to him than the stern discipline and the balls and bayonets are to the martial dreamer; the one great thorn of the priest's crown—celibacy—he is utterly incapable of appreciating. So he declares his wish to his parents, and they take every precaution to prevent the lapse of his inclination. In due time, before the breath of the world can sully the purity of his mind—that is to say, before he can know what he is about to sacrifice—he is introduced into the seminary or monastery, where every means is employed to foster and strengthen his inclination until he shall have bound himself for life by an irrevocable vow.

That is the ordinary growth of a vocation to the clerical state to-day. There are exceptions, but men of maturer age rarely seek admission into the cloister now. Occasionally a "convert" to Rome in the first rush of zeal plunges headlong into ascetical excesses. Sometimes a man of more advanced years will enter a monastery in order to attain the priesthood more easily; monastic superiors are not unwilling, especially if a generous alms is given to a monastery, to press a timid aspirant through the episcopal examinations (which are less formidable to monks), and then allow him, with a dispensation from Rome, to pass into the ranks of the secular clergy. There are cases, it is true, when a man becomes seriously enamoured of the monastic ideal, and seeks admission into the cloister; rarely, however, does his zeal survive the first year of practical experience.

Apart from such exceptional cases, monasteries and seminaries receive their yearly reinforcements from boys of from fourteen to fifteen years. Nothing could be more distant from the Roman Catholic practice than the Anglican custom of choosing the Church at an age of deliberation, during or after the university career. The Catholic priesthood would be hopelessly impoverished if that course were adopted. The earliest boyish wish is jealously consecrated, for Catholic parents are only too eager to contribute a member to the ranks of the clergy, and ecclesiastical authorities are only too deficient in agreeable applications for the dignity. The result is that, instead of a boy being afforded opportunities of learning what life really is before he makes a solemn sacrifice of its fairest gifts, he is carefully preserved from contact with it through fear of endangering his vocation. Too often, indeed, he is unduly influenced by the eagerness of his relatives, he enters a seminary or a convent for their gratification or glorification, and, if he has not the courage to return, to the disappointment and mortification of his friends, he bears for the rest of his life a broken or a depraved heart under his vestments of silk and gold. For it must be remembered that before he reaches what is usually considered to be the age of deliberation he is chained for life to his oar, as will appear in the next chapter.

There was no trace of undue family influence in my own case, but as my vocation was typical in its banality, a few words on it will illustrate the theme.

My boyhood and early youth were spent under the shadow of a beautiful Franciscan church at Manchester. I have a distinct recollection that, in spite of my eagerness to serve in the sanctuary, my mind was closed against the idea of joining the fraternity. The friars frequently suggested it in playful mood, but I always repulsed their advances. At length a lay brother¹ with whom I spent long hours in the sacristy exerted himself to inspire me with a desire to enter their Order. After many conversations I yielded to his influence. Twice circumstances intervened to prevent me from joining, and I acquiesced in them as easily as I had done in my "vocation." At length a third attempt was made to arrange my admission, and I rather listlessly gave my name as a pupil and aspirant to the monastic life. I had been conscious throughout of merely yielding to circumstances, to the advice and exhortations of my elders. There was no definite craving for the life on my part, certainly no "voice speaking within me" to which I felt it a duty to submit. I do not, of course, mean to say that my subsequent profession was in any way a matter of constraint. Once within the walls of the monastery, my mind was seriously and deliberately formed, in so far as we may regard the reflections of a boy of fifteen as serious. I am merely describing the manner in which a religious "vocation" is engendered. About the same time a Jesuit, the late F. Anderdon, S.J., made advances to me from another direction; and a third proposal was made to send me to the diocesan seminary to study for the secular clergy. There seem to have been no premonitory symptoms in my youthful conduct of the scandal of my later years.

The "vocations" of most of my fellow-students, and of my students in later years, had a similar origin. They had either lived in the vicinity of a Franciscan convent, or their parish had been visited by Franciscan missionaries. Already troubled with a vague desire for a sacerdotal career, the picturesque brown robe, the eventful life, and the commanding influence of the missionary had completed their vision. They felt a "vocation" to the Order of St. Francis; their parents, if they were at all unwilling, were too religious to resist; the missionary was informed (after an unsuccessful struggle on the part of the parish priest to get the boy for the diocesan seminary), and the boy of thirteen or fourteen was admitted to the monastic college.

Other religious orders are recruited, as a rule, in the same way. The more important bodies—the Jesuits, Benedictines, and Dominicans—have more reliable sources of supply in their large public schools at Stonyhurst, Douai, and Downside. In those institutions the thoughts of the more promising pupils can easily be directed into the higher channels of religious aspiration by the zealous monks, without any undue influence whatever. But the minor congregations are sorely pressed for recruits; many of them, indeed, were glad to accept the very small fish that ran through even the net of the Franciscans. Ireland furnishes most of the recruits to the English orders and clergy.

Missionaries are the principal recruiting sergeants. Besides holding his "revival exercises" for the good of souls, the missionary has the task of procuring funds and novices for his monastery; and in proportion to his success in this will be his superior's thoughtfulness in appointing him to the more comfortable missions. For the modern missionary is not so insensible to the charms of hospitality as his mediæval forerunner was.

The ranks of the secular clergy are recruited in the same way. Large numbers of boys, usually of the middle and poorer classes, are drafted annually into the preparatory seminaries, to be preserved jealously in their vocation if they have one, or inspired with one if they have not. Parents and parish priests are continually on the watch for symptoms of the divine call, and in the case of clever, quiet boys the desire is tactfully created.

Finally, a word must be said here of the vocation of nuns; more will be said of them in the following chapter. It is true that the proportion of women who take the veil in maturer years is much larger than that of men. Whatever may be their ultimate attitude, it must be admitted that there is a large amount of earnestness and religious sincerity in the vocations of women. Still the number of young girls who are received into nunneries is lamentably high, and the anxiety shown by nun-teachers to inspire their pupils with a "vocation" is extremely deplorable. They frequently request priests to secure aspirants for their congregations, and many a priest is tempted, out of desire to find favour at the convent (an important social distinction), to welcome the first word that his girl-penitents breathe in the confessional about a religious vocation. Many priests develop quite a mania for sending their penitents to convents. For myself, in my hours of deepest faith I never found courage to send a girl to a nunnery. One girl, a penitent of mine, often solicited me about her vocation. I am thankful to say that I restrained her, and that no heart is, owing to my action, wearing itself out to-day in the dreary institutions which we know as nunneries. It is a fiction of the Catholic novelist that most nuns are happy in the life they have chosen.

A conspicuous advantage of this system (from the ecclesiastical point of view) is that it affords time for a more extensive and systematic training. If other Christian sects prefer the more honourable course of not extending any ecclesiastical sanction whatever to aspirants until they arrive at a deliberative age, they must and do suffer in consequence in the training of their ministry. The divinity lectures which the Anglicans follow are but a feeble substitute for the specialised education which their grave responsibility as religious teachers obviously demands; and in a large proportion of cases the theological training of Anglican curates begins and ends with such lectures. In later years, when contact with earnest readers impresses them with a due sense of their position, they are not infrequently heard to desiderate the systematic training of their Romanist rivals. No doubt in point of general culture they are much superior to the average priest; one can often recognise the priest who has entered the sanctuary in a maturer age, after secession from Anglicanism, by that impalpable culture which is the characteristic gift of the university.

How it happens that the Catholic educational system produces such inferior results will appear subsequently; in theory it is admirably constructed for the attainment of the ecclesiastical aim. Instead of merely adding to an ordinary liberal education a few lectures on current theological controversies, it takes the boy of thirteen or fourteen and arranges his whole curriculum up to the age of twenty-four with a direct relation to his sacerdotal ministry. The course of training thus extends over a period of ten or eleven years under direct ecclesiastical control. The boy is handed over by his parents and transferred to the seminary, or to a preparatory college in connection with it, where his education is at once undertaken by clerics. All the larger dioceses have their own seminaries, and each monastic body has its colleges.

The scheme of education is divided broadly, according to universal ecclesiastical usage, into three sections. The preliminary training consists of the usual course of classics and mathematics; the classics being more than usually expurgated, and the whole training generously provided with spiritual and ascetical exercises. This stage extends over a period of five or six years on the average. To the "humanities" succeeds a course of scholastic philosophy, which usually occupies two years, and which now usually includes a few carefully expurgated and commentated lessons on physical science. Finally the student is treated to a three years' course of theology, passes a severe examination, and is admitted to ordination. The various stages will be described more in detail as the writer passed through them.

Such is the scheme of education of the Catholic priesthood all the world over, with but few local variations. The mendicant orders and the minor congregations generally corrupt and mutilate it: the larger seminaries and the more important orders expand it. The Jesuits have the longest and fullest curriculum, and their educational scheme has the highest reputation. In reality the curriculum of the Jesuit student is protracted mainly because he has to spend long periods in teaching, during which his own studies are materially impeded. Although the Jesuits have the finest Catholic schools to draw pupils from, and the longest curriculum of clerical training, it will hardly be contended that, as a body, they show any marked superiority over their less-dreaded colleagues, either in literature or pulpit oratory.

The Benedictines and Dominicans also conduct their preliminary studies in a creditable manner in their well-known colleges, but most of the other religious bodies are extremely negligent in that stage of clerical education. Each religious order is responsible for the training of its own candidates. The religious orders—the regular or monastic clergy as opposed to the secular—do not fall directly under the jurisdiction of the bishop of the diocese. Monks are irregular auxiliaries of the ecclesiastical army, and are supposed to emerge occasionally from their mountain fastnesses to assist in the holy warfare. The monasteries of the same order in each land are grouped into a province, and the central authority, the provincial, exercises a quasi-episcopal jurisdiction over them. All the provinces are united under a common general at Rome; and there is a special congregation of cardinals at Rome to regulate the conflicts (not infrequent) of bishops and the monastic clergy. Hence monks have but few points of contact with episcopal authority, and indeed they are usually regarded with jealous suspicion by the bishop and the secular clergy. Cardinal Manning was known to cherish a profound antipathy to all religious orders except the Franciscan, and to the Franciscans he said, with characteristic candour: "I like you—where you are (in East London)." Indeed, nearly throughout England the monastic orders have been compelled to undertake parochial duties like the ordinary clergy.

However, the comparative independence of the monastic orders gives them an opportunity of modifying the scheme of education according to the pressure of circumstances, and the general result is extremely unsatisfactory. The low ideal of sacerdotal education which they usually cherish is largely explained by the strong foreign element pervading, if not dominating, them. They have been founded, at no very remote date, by foreigners (by Belgians in England, and by Germans and Italians in the States), and are still frequently reinforced from the Continent. And it will be conceded at once that the continental priest (or even the Irish priest) does not attach a very grave importance to the necessity of culture. A priest has definite functions assigned him by the Church, and for their due fulfilment he needs a moderate acquaintance with liturgy, casuistry, and dogma; beyond these all is a matter of taste. Relying, in Catholic countries, upon the dogmatic idea, and the instinctive reverence which his parishioners have for the priesthood, he does not concern himself about any further means of conciliating and impressing them. The consequence is that a low standard of education is accepted, and those who have imported it into English-speaking countries have not fully appreciated their new environment—have not realised that here a clergyman is expected to be a gentleman of culture and refinement. The effect is most clearly seen in a wanton neglect of classics. The Franciscan régime, at the time I made its acquaintance, may serve as an instance.

The preparatory college of the Grey Friars (for they retain the name in spite of the fact that they now wear the brown robe of their Belgian cousins) was, at that time, part of their large monastery at Manchester. Seraphic Colleges, as the Franciscan colleges are called (because St. Francis is currently named the “Seraphic” Saint), are a recent innovation on their scheme of studies, on account of the falling-off of vocations amongst more advanced students. The college was not a grave burden on the time and resources of the friars at that period. One of their number, an estimable and energetic priest, whose only defect was his weakness in classics, was appointed to conduct the classical studies and generally supervise and instruct the few aspirants to the order who presented themselves. We numbered eight that year, and it may be safely doubted whether there was an idler and more mischievous set of collegiates in the United Kingdom. Our worthy professor knew little more of boys than he did of girls, and he had numerous engagements to fulfil in addition to his professorial duties. The rector of the college, a delightfully obtuse old Belgian friar, would have discharged his function equally well if he had lived on Mars.

In spite, however, of the discouraging circumstances we contrived to attain our object very rapidly. We were all anxious to begin our monastic career in robe and tonsure as soon as possible, and all that the order required as a preliminary condition was a moderate acquaintance with Latin—the language of the Liturgy. Our professor, indeed, had a higher but imperfectly grasped ideal. He added French and Greek to our programme. Physics and mathematics were unthought-of luxuries, and our English was left at its natural level, which was, in most cases, a rich and substantial Irish brogue; but at one time our professor began to give us a course of Hebrew, learning the day's lesson himself on the previous evening. Still, taking advantage of the fact that I studied at my own home, I was enabled to present a list of conquests at the end of the year which at once secured my admission to the monastic garb. The list will serve to illustrate further our educational proceedings: it comprised, (1) French grammar and a little French literature (such as Fénélon's Télémaque); (2) Greek grammar, St. John's Gospel, one book of Xenophon, and a few pages of the Iliad—crammed for the purpose of disconcerting the monastic examiner; (3) Latin grammar, several lives from Nepos, two books of Cæsar, six orations of Cicero, the Catilina of Sallust, the Germania of Tacitus, the Ars Poetica of Horace, two books of Livy, two books of the Æneid, and fragments of Ovid, Terence, and Curtius. As I remained at the college only from June 1884 until the following May, it will be seen how much private care and exertion were required in later years to correct the crudity of such an education.

The kindness of my first professor and of most of my later teachers will ever be remembered by me. I was treated always as the favourite pupil. Yet this description of the only training which the Roman Church gave me, apart from a theological equipment which is now useless, will suffice to answer the ridiculous and frequent statement that I owe my knowledge of languages, science, and history to that Church. Such as that knowledge is, it represents thirty years of intense personal labour. Even of Latin only an elementary knowledge is given by the Church. Very few monks could read Vergil at sight.

Those were not the worst days of our Seraphic College. Our professor was an earnest and hard-working priest, though an indifferent scholar, an unskilful teacher, and burdened with many tasks. But the time came when even less discretion was exercised; and not only were studies neglected, but the youthful aspirants to the monastic life, living in a monastery, had more licence than they would have had in any college in England. The system is somewhat better to-day. I was myself entrusted with the task of reconstructing it ten years later. But I pass on to my first acquaintance with the inner working of monastic life.

CHAPTER III

NOVITIATE

THE novitiate is an episode in the training of the monastic, not of the secular, clergy: it is a period of probation imposed upon all aspirants to the monastic life. Religious of every order and congregation,¹ both men and women, must spend at least one year as "novices" before they are permitted to bind themselves by the solemnity of the vows. During that period they experience the full severity and asceticism of the life to which they aspire, and they are minutely observed and tested by their superiors. It is a wise provision: the least that can be done to palliate the gravity of taking such an irrevocable step. Since no formal study is permitted during its course, it causes an interruption of the "humanities" of the monastic clerics.

In the original intention of the founders of the monastic orders there was no distinction between cleric and lay members. Francis of Assisi, who was not a priest himself, simply drew up a rule of life, a modified version of his own extraordinary life, and allowed his followers, after due probation, to bind themselves by vow to its fulfilment. In it he naïvely proscribes study: "Let those who know not letters not seek to learn them." However, although a divine inspiration is claimed for him in his first composition of the rule, he soon recognised the necessity of a different treatment of his clerical brethren; Antony of Padua was appointed by him "to teach theology to the brethren." He had not been many years in his grave—his premature death was not unassisted by his grief at the growing corruption of his order (the saintly Antony of Padua having already been publicly flogged in the convent of Aracæli at Rome for his dogged resistance to the corruptors)—when the intellectual fever of the thirteenth century completely mastered the fraternity, and friars were to be found in hundreds at all the great universities, even in the professorial chairs at Oxford, Paris, and Cologne. Gradually the lay-brothers became the mere servants of the priests; and the studies of the clerics were duly organised.

At that time and until the present century the neophytes were men of a more advanced age. After twelve months of trial, prayer, and reflection, they were permitted to make their vows or "profession," from which there was no dispensation. In recent years, however, the practice of receiving aspirants at an earlier age has developed so rapidly that one feels apprehensive of a revival of the old Benedictine custom of accepting children of tender years, whose parents were resolved that they should be monks, for financial or political reasons. Pius IX. made an important change in this direction. "Attenta raritate vocationum —seeing the fewness of vocations,” as he frankly confessed, he decreed that there should be two sets of vows. It would be too serious an outrage on human nature to allow boys of sixteen to contract an utterly irrevocable¹ obligation of so grave a character; at the same time it was clearly imperative to secure boys at that age if the religious orders were not to die of inanition. So a compromise was effected. Boys should be admitted to the monastic life at the age of fifteen for their novitiate, and should make what are called “simple” vows at the age of sixteen. From the simple vows the Pope was prepared to grant a dispensation: and the General of the order could annul them (on the part of the order) if the neophyte turned out unsatisfactory. The “solemn” or indispensable vows would be taken at nineteen, leaving three years as a kind of secondary novitiate.

Thus the criticism of the enemies of monasticism was thought to be averted, and at the same time boys were practically secured at an early age; for it will be readily imagined that few boys would care to make an application to Rome for a dispensation and return to disturb the peaceful content of their families—having, moreover, had twelve months’ probation besides two or three years in a monastic college. In justice to the monks I must add that I have never known a case in which difficulties have been put in the way of one who desired a dispensation: certainly the accusation of physical detention in monasteries or convents is without foundation in my experience. If the student was promising, their advice to him to reconsider his position would, no doubt, take a very urgent and solemn character; if he persisted, I feel sure they would conscientiously procure his dispensation. However, in my personal experience I have only known one instance; the youth had entered under the influence of relatives and endured the strain for two years, but he wisely revolted at length, sought a dispensation, and took to the stage.

It is thus explained how the monastic career usually commences at such an early age. A visitor to the novitiate of any order (a privilege which is rarely granted) cannot fail to notice the extreme youth of most of those who are engaged in weighing the tremendous problem of an irrevocable choice. They have, as a rule, entered the preliminary college at the age of thirteen, and have been called upon to come to a decision, fraught with such momentous consequences, at the age of fifteen or sixteen.

The novitiate, as the convent is called in which the novices are trained, is normally a distinct and secluded monastery; but economy of space frequently compels the monks merely to devote the wing of some existing monastery to the purpose. In either case the regulations for its complete isolation are very severe. The novices are not allowed to leave the monastery under any pretext whatever, and they are permitted to receive but few visitors, and to have little correspondence (which is carefully examined) with the outside world. The comparison of monastic and secular life is conspicuously one-sided.

For the novitiate of the Franciscan Order at that time a portion of their friary¹ at Killarney had been set aside. The three enterprising Belgian friars who invaded England forty or fifty years ago found themselves presently compelled to carry their tent to the more hospitable sister-isle. At Killarney their presence led to scenes of enthusiasm that take one back to the Middle Ages. The peasantry flew to their assistance, and before long they erected the plain but substantial building which catches the eye of the tourist on issuing from the station. The friary enjoyed an uninterrupted prosperity from the date of its foundation, with the usual consequence that its inner life soon became much more notable for comfort than for asceticism. However, one or two small scandals, the advent of a hostile bishop, the impoverishment of the country, and frequent visits from higher authorities, brought about a curtailment of the friars' amenities. And when the place was chosen as convent of the novitiate, the good friars put their house in order, tightened their girdles, and resigned themselves to a more or less regular discipline; for one of their most sacred principles is that novices must not be scandalised.

The first emotion which the place inspired in me when I entered it at the end of May 1885 was one of profound melancholy and discontent. It had a large and well-cultivated garden, and before us daily was the lovely and changeful panorama of the hills. But the interior of the monastery, with its chill, gloomy cloisters, its solemn and silent inmates, gave me a deep impression of solitude and isolation. When we sat down to supper at the bare wooden tables on the evening of our arrival—my first community-meal—widely separated from each other, eating in profound silence, and with a most depressing gravity, I felt that my monastic career would be a short one. A young friend had entered their novitiate the previous year, and had ignominiously taken flight two days after his arrival; I found myself warmly sympathising with him.

However, since we were not to receive the monastic garb for a week or more, we were allowed a good deal of liberty, and my depression gradually wore off. It happened, too, that I was already acquainted with three of the friars, and soon became attached to the community. The first friar whom we had met, a lay-brother, rather increased our trouble; he was already far advanced in religious mania and ascetical consumption, and did, in fact, die a year afterwards in the local asylum. The second we met, also a lay-brother, did not help to remove the unfavourable impression. His jovial and effusive disposition only accentuated his curious deformity of structure; his hands and bare toes diverged conspicuously from the central axis, one shoulder was much higher than its fellow, his nose was a pronounced specimen of the Socratic type, and a touch of rheumatism imparted a shuffling gait to the entire composition. Happily we found that the teratological department of the convent ended with these two.

Our novice-master, or “Instructor,” at that time was an excellent and much esteemed friar of six-and-twenty years; we were soon convinced of his kindness, consideration, and religious sincerity, and accepted willingly the intimate relations with him in which our position placed us. The superior of the monastery likewise had no difficulty in securing our esteem. He was a kindly, generous, and upright man, but without a touch of asceticism. Tall and very stout, with dark twinkling eyes and full features, he was a real "Friar of Orders Grey" of the good old times. He was a Belgian, but he had attained wide popularity in Kerry by acquiring a good Flemish parody of an Irish brogue, and constructing a genealogical tree in which some safely remote ancestor was shown to be Irish. His ideal of life was not heroic, but he acted up to it conscientiously; he was genuinely pious in church, fulminatory in pulpit and confessional, kind and familiar with the poor and sick, generous and a moderate disciplinarian in his convent.

A few lay-brothers and four other priests made up the rest of the community. There was a cultured and refined young friar, who, after a few years of perverse misunderstanding and petty persecution from his brethren, took to drink, and was happily rescued from his position by the hand of death. A second, a tall, eccentric friar, ultimately became a stumbling-block to his fraternity and was expelled for drunkenness; another, a little, stout Lancashireman, of earnest and blameless life, and of a deeply humane and affectionate disposition, fell a victim a year later to typhus. Lastly, there was a little, round, rubicund Irishman of enthusiastic, unreasoning piety; kind, ascetical, hard-working, studious (he studied everything except religious evidences), he was a greatly respected figure in Irish missionary circles. The one rule he confided to young missionaries was: "Throw the fire of hell at them"; and with his own stentorian voice (though he told you he was consumptive, and that one lung had already decayed) he threw it with prodigious effect amongst the peasantry.

A few days afterwards we were duly clothed with the monastic garb. The "clothing" has developed into an impressive religious ceremony, and as there were six of us (of whom four were under the age of sixteen) to be clothed on this occasion, and it was the inauguration of a new novitiate, the event was celebrated with much solemnity. The six tunics ("habits," as they are called) of rough brown frieze, with their knotted cords, were blessed and sprinkled with holy water during the mass, and we were solemnly enrobed with the consecrated garments amidst much prayer and psalm-singing, and the audible groans of the peasantry.

Our heads had been shaven in advance, leaving a bald uncomfortable patch on the vertex about the size of a cheese plate, a symbol, it is said, of the crown of thorns of Christ's passion. The brown tunic is also symbolical of the passion, for it is made in the form of a cross, the body being of the same width from neck to foot, and the wide sleeves branching out at right angles. However, the symbolism is an outgrowth of more modern piety. Francis of Assisi made no fantastic choice of a costume. Casting aside his rich garments at his conversion, he merely adopted the costume of the Italian beggar of his time—a rough tunic and hood, girded with a knotted cord, and sandals to his feet. The habit which excites so much comment on the modern friar is thus merely an Italian beggar's costume of the thirteenth century; substantially, at least, for it too has fallen under the law of evolution. In fact, the point of vital importance on which the two great branches of the Franciscan Order¹ diverge is the sartorial question, What was the original form of the habit of St. Francis? The Capuchins hold that his hood (or "capuce") was long and pointed, and that he had a beard; their rivals—the Observantes, Recollecti, and Reformati—dissent, and their age-long and unfraternal strife on the subject became as fierce and alarming as the historical controversy of the Dominicans and Jesuits of the sixteenth century on the nature of grace. The Roman authorities had to intervene and stop the flow of literature and untheological language by declaring all further publications on the subject to be on the Index Expurgatorius.

The costume is still uncomfortable and insanitary. In summer the heavy robe and the rough woollen underclothing are intolerable; in winter the looseness and width of the tunic promote ventilation to an undesirable extent; and sandals, with all respect to Mr. Edward Carpenter, are neither healthy nor delectable. The rule prescribes that the costume consist of "two tunics, a hood, a girdle, and drawers," but in England and America the inner tunic is interpreted to mean an ordinary woollen shirt; on the Continent it is a second tight-fitting tunic of the same brown material.

A mantle of the same colour is usually worn out of doors, and is considered part of the costume during the winter.

The name of the novice is changed when he enters the monastery, as a sign that he is henceforth dead to the world. The surname is entirely dropped, and the Christian name is changed into that of some saint of the order, who is adopted as patron; thus my own name was changed into Antony. We were now, therefore, fully fledged friars—of the mature age of fifteen—and we entered at once upon the dull routine of the monastic life. The character of the life will be best understood by a detailed description of an ordinary monastic day.

At a quarter to five every morning one of the friars was awakened by his alarm-clock, and proceeded at once to rouse the community. We novices, having the eye of our instructor constantly upon us, shot out of our rooms with proper despatch, but in most cases the procedure was not so simple. There were friars of all stages of somnolency. Some, of nervous temperament, heard the alarm themselves, and perhaps rushed upstairs for a cold bath (a luxury admitted in the degenerate friaries of England and the States); the majority were aroused by a vigorous tap of the wooden hammer at their door, accompanied by the pious salutation, "Laudetur Jesus Christus," to which they sleepily responded "Amen" (or made some other pious or facetious observation); some slept so profoundly that the knocker-up had to enter their rooms and shake them violently every morning. On one occasion a young friar was carried out on his mattress in profound sleep by his fellow-students and laid in the middle of the busy corridor. When the round was completed (all the bedrooms opening into a wide central corridor, in accordance with the ever-watchful constitutions), the large bell sent a deafening clangour through the dormitories, and we quickly prepared for chapel.

A quarter of an hour was allowed for the purpose, but, as our toilet was extremely simple, most of the friars who had got beyond the stage of "primitive innocence" continued their slumbers for five or ten minutes. We were ordered by the constitutions to retain all our underclothing during the night, so there was nothing to do but throw on the rough brown robe and gird it with the knotted cord. Then, towel in hand, we raced to our common lavatory, for our simple cells of twelve feet square were not encumbered with washstands and toilet tables. In the lavatory a long narrow zinc trough, with a few metal basins and a row of taps overhead, was provided for our ablutions. I afterwards discovered that, crude as it was, this arrangement was rather luxurious for a friary.

At the end of the quarter the bell rang out its second warning, and all were supposed to be kneeling in their stalls in the choir by that time. The superior's eye wandered over the room to see if all were present, and any unfortunate sleeper was at once summoned, and would have to do public penance for his fault at dinner. At five the religious exercises began, and they continued, with half-an-hour's interval, until eight o'clock.

The ancient monastic custom of rising at midnight for the purpose of chanting the "Office" finds little favour with modern monks; and, even from a religious point of view, they are wise. I was enabled to make observations on the custom some years later on the Continent, and I found little ground for that enthusiasm which Roman Catholic writers (usually those who have never tried it) frequently express. A few devotees enter into the service with their usual fervour; but the vast majority, to whom a religious concentration of thought during an hour's service is an impossibility, even in their most lucid hours, are fatally oppressed with sleep and weariness. In summer they fall asleep in their stalls; in winter the night's repose is lost, and many constitutions are ruined, by the hour or hour and a half spent in the icy-cold chapel at midnight. There is very slender ground for romantic admiration.

The "Office" which is thus chanted in choir is a collection of Latin psalms, hymns, and readings from Scripture, which every priest is bound to recite every day. The monks chant it, or "psalmody" it, as they say, in a monotone in their chapel at various hours of the day; "Matins and Lauds," the principal section, form the opening ceremony in the morning. It lasts about an hour, and is followed by a half-hour of silent meditation—a sad pitfall for the somnolent at that early hour. During meditation the friars turn away from each other and kneel in their stalls, with their faces buried in their hands and their arms resting on the seat. A facetious London priest, who had once endeavoured to pass through the novitiate of a monastery, used to tell me that he was discharged because he snored so loudly during meditation as to disturb the slumbers of the elder brethren. Mass followed, and then breakfast was taken in profound silence. It was a simple meal, consisting only of coffee (taken in bowls, and without sugar—except on fast-days) and bread and butter; during the meal a few pages of the Imitation of Christ were read aloud. After breakfast a further section of the Office was chanted, and we were dismissed to arrange our rooms; for every friar, even the highest superior, is his own chambermaid.

Afterwards we were allowed a quarter of an hour in the garden in strict silence, and then our semi-religious studies and classes commenced. During the novitiate profane study is prohibited (the perusal of a Greek grammar one day brought on me as severe a reprimand as if it had been a French novel), and the time is occupied with religious exercises, of which we had seven or eight hours daily, and the study of our rule and constitutions, of ritual, and of ascetical literature. At half-past eleven another section of the Office was chanted, at twelve there was a second half-hour of silent contemplation (an injudicious custom—St. Teresa rightly maintained that one cannot meditate fasting), and at 12.30 the welcome dinner bell was heard. Growling, rather than reciting, a De Profundis for departed benefactors, we walked in silent procession to the refectory, where, standing face to face in two long rows down the room, we chanted a long and curiously intonated grace.

Dinner was taken in strict silence. Two friars read aloud, in Latin and English alternately, from Scripture or some ascetical work, and the superior gave the necessary signals with a small bell that hung before him. There were no table-cloths, as monks are forbidden the use of linnen, but our pine tables were as smooth as marble and scrupulously clean. The friars only sit on one side of the table, on benches fixed into the wall, so that the long narrow tables run round the sides of the room. The dinner itself was frugal but substantial enough; it usually consisted of soup, two courses of meat and two vegetables, and fruit, with a pint of beer to each friar. A pint is the constitutional potion, but we juniors were, after grave deliberation, allowed to have a smaller mug as a concession to English sobriety. Many of us had hardly reached the age of strong drink, but we were forced to take our two mugs daily, at dinner and supper, with the rest. In Belgian and German friaries there is an amusing intrigue constantly going on for securing the larger mugs, and there even the youngest novices must drink at least three pints of beer a day.

After dinner tongues were loosened at last, and recreation permitted until 2.30. There is a curious custom for two of the friars (a priest and a student) to wash the dishes after dinner. A large tank of hot water containing the dishes is suitably mounted in the kitchen, and the two friars, armed with cloths tied to the end of sticks, hurry through their task, chanting meanwhile alternate verses of the Miserere in Latin, freely interspersed with comments on the temperature of the water. From this custom, too, the element of spiritual romance has departed. Every Friday evening, when the offices of the ensuing week are distributed at supper, and announced in Latin by the reader, it is still prescribed that "Pater A—— et Frater B—— lavabunt scutellas," but the ceremony has not a particle of the spiritual force it had in the days when the papal legates, bringing the cardinal's hat to the great St. Bonaventure, found him so employed, and were told to hang the hat on the bushes until he had finished.

Recreation is, in all monasteries, an incurably dull affair. It generally consists of a walk round the garden, while the friars indulge in light banter or ponderous discussions of theology. We were allowed cricket at the beginning of our monastic career, but it was presently vetoed by a foreign authority on the ground that it was contrary to religious modesty. Hand-ball was played by the students, and at one place an ineffectual attempt was made to introduce tennis. The lay-brothers and the priests played dominoes or skittles; but the three castes—priests, students, and lay-brothers—are forbidden to intermingle, or even to speak to each other without necessity. Cards are strictly forbidden in the monastic constitutions; bagatelle was popular, and billiards not unknown; and I have known the priests of a London monastery to occupy their recreation with marbles for many months. It was strangely impressive to hear such problems as Predestination or Neo-Malthusianism discussed over a game of marbles.

At 2.30 the bell summoned us to choir for Vespers, the last section of the Office, and shortly afterwards tea was announced. Nothing was eaten, but each friar received a large bowl of tea; many of the older friars took a second pint of beer instead, for tea was a comparatively recent innovation. The Belgian friars and the early English missionaries always take beer. Silence was not enforced during the quarter of an hour which is allowed for tea, but at its termination the strictest silence was supposed to be observed until recreation on the following day. In point of fact, however, the law of monastic silence is only observed with any degree of fidelity by novices and students, and by these only so long as the superior is within earshot. "Charity," they would plead in justification, "is the greatest of all commandments."

After an hour of prayer and spiritual reading we continued our pious studies until 6.30, when a third half-hour of silent contemplation had to be accomplished. It was pitiful, sometimes, to see young students endeavouring to keep their attention fixed upon the abstract doctrines of Christianity for so long a time—to see them nervously tightening their lips against the assaults of the evil one. For our monastic literature, never entertaining for a moment the idea that such a performance was beyond the powers of the average individual, taught us to see in spirit myriads of ugly little demons, with pointed ears and forked tails, sitting on our shoulders and on the arms of our stalls, and filling our minds with irrelevant thoughts. In fact, our worthy novice-master (and a number of reputable authors) assured us that these imps had been seen on more than one occasion by particularly pious elder brethren; that on one dread occasion, happily long ago, a full-sized demon had entered the choir with a basket and orthodox trident, discovered a young friar who was distracted in his prayers, and promptly disappeared with him in his basket. To all of which we were obliged to listen with perfect gravity, if we set any value upon our sojourn in the monastery.

A series of mental devices, or “methods of meditation,” had been invented for the purpose of aiding the mind to fix its gaze on the things of the spirit without interruption. Unfortunately they were often so complicated as to make confusion worse confounded. The method which our instructor selected for us was quite an elaborate treatise in itself. I remember one of our novices confiding to me the trouble it occasioned him. The method was, of course, merely an abstract form of thought to be filled in with the subject one chose to meditate about. But my comrade, a clever ex-solicitor, had by some incomprehensible confusion actually mistaken it for the subject of meditation, and complained that the bell usually rang before he had got through the scheme, and that he had no time left to consider the particular virtue or vice he had wished to meditate upon. On the whole, it will be readily understood that of the seven hours of prayer which were imposed upon us at that period six at least were a sheer waste of time.

At seven we were summoned to supper—a simple meal of eggs or cold meat, potatoes, and beer. Afterwards, on three evenings per week, we took the discipline, or self-scourging. Each friar repaired to his cell for the purpose and flogged himself (at his own discretion) across the shoulders with a knotted cord, whilst the superior, kneeling in the middle of the corridor, recited the Miserere aloud. Knowing that our instructor used to listen at our doors during the performance, we frequently gave him an exaggerated impression of our fervour by religiously flogging the desk or any other resonant surface. However, our instruments of torture were guaranteed to be perfectly harmless, even in the hands of a fanatic. I remember how we hated a bloodthirsty little Portuguese friar, who told us, with a suggestion of imitation, stories of the way they took discipline in Portugal. But before the end of the novitiate we had learned the true value of the edifying tales with which visitors invariably entertained the novices.

The remainder of the evening was spent in private devotions or spiritual reading, and at 9.30 we were obliged to retire. Straw mattresses and a few blankets were our only bed-furniture; and one wooden chair, a plain desk, with half-a-dozen necessary books, completed the inventory of the cell. A small plaster crucifix was the only decoration on the unwashed walls. Our dormitory was cut off from the others by a special partition which was locked every evening, for the papal regulations for the isolation of novices were very stringent. Our novice-master kept the key, and even the superior of the monastery was not allowed to enter our department except in the company of one of the older friars.

That was the ordinary course of our lives throughout the year of the novitiate, and indeed it had few variations. Feast-days were the principal events we looked forward to; in fact, it would be safe to say that few boys would persevere in their condition if the feast-days were abolished. A score of festivals were indicated in the constitutions on which the superior was directed to allow conversation at dinner, and to give wine to the brethren: "half a bottle to each" was the generous allowance of the constitutions. In ordinary monasteries festivals are much more frequent, and conversation is granted at dinner on the slightest pretext. In the novitiate, where a stricter discipline prevailed, we had usually two or three every month, and on the more important feasts the midday dinner assumed enormous proportions. At Christmas the quantity of fowl and other seasonable food which was sent in occupied our strenuous attention during a full week; in fact, all our convents had the custom of celebrating the entire octave of Christmas with full gastronomic honours.

So many friends conceived the happy idea of sending a gift to the "poor friars" that the larder was swollen with vast quantities of Christmas fare. I had never tasted beer or wine before I entered the monastery, but a little calculation shows that I must (in my sixteenth year) have consumed fifty gallons of ale and a dozen bottles of good wine during that first year of monastic life.

The greatest event of the year, however, was the patronal feast of the superior of the monastery. He was a warm favourite in Killarney, and there were enough comestibles (and potables) sent in to store a small ship, the two neighbouring nunneries especially, and a host of friends, vying with each other in the profusion and excellence of gifts to honour his festival. Even when a feast-day fell upon a fast-day, the restriction in solids was usually compensated by a greater generosity in fluids; we young novices were more than exhilarated on one or two occasions when dinner had opened with a strong claret soup, had been accompanied by the usual pint of beer and a glass of sherry, and followed by two or three glasses of excellent port—sometimes even champagne. Nor is the restriction to fish felt very acutely in Killarney, where the lakes yield magnificent salmon, and where, by a most ingenious process of casuistic reasoning, water-fowl are included under the heading of fish!

The monotony of the life was also relieved by the occurrence of the fasts. Besides the ordinary fasts of the Church, the friars observe several that are peculiar to their rule of life, especially a long fast from the first of November until Christmas. However, there are now few who really fast—that is to say, content themselves with one full meal per day—even in monasteries; abstinence from flesh meat is the usual limit of monastic mortification. On the Continent fasting, in the strict sense of the word, is much more frequently practised in monasteries, but it may be questioned if idleness is not too heavy a price to pay for an observance which is discredited by modern moralists of all schools. In England and the States the monks, and clergy generally, more wisely prefer industry to fasting, though it is regrettable that they do not modify their professions in accordance. The Passionists are the only English congregation who cling to the practice with any fidelity, and their statistics of premature mortality are a sufficient commentary on the stupidity of the Italian authorities who are responsible for it.¹

Moreover, the “fasting” of modern times departs not a little from the primitive model. I have seen the “one full meal” which is allowed at midday protracted until four o’clock; and a partial meal has been introduced in the evening. Drink, of course, does not break the fast, except strong soup, chocolate, and a few other thick fluids, a list of which is duly drawn up by casuists. Any amount of beer or wine may be taken. And since it is, or may be, injurious to drink much without eating, a certain quantity of bread is allowed with the morning coffee; at night (or in the morning if preferred), eight or ten ounces of solid food are permitted. The Franciscans are much reprov'd by rival schools of theologians for their laxity in this regard, and the strained interpretation they put upon admitted principles. At one time a caricature was brought out in Rome depicting a Franciscan friar complacently attacking a huge flagon of ale and a generous allowance of bread and cheese in the middle of his fast. To the ale was attached the sound theological aphorism, "Potus non frangit jejunium—drink does not break the fast"; the huge chunk of bread was justified by the received principle, "Ne potus noceat—in order that the drink may do no harm"; and the cheese was added in virtue of the well-known saying, "Parum pro nihilo reputatur—a little counts as nothing."

Since there was no parish attached to the monastery at Killarney (which is the correct canonical status of a monastery), a few words must be said of the life of the priests. At that time it was a hopeless mystery to me, and it is principally from later observation and information that I am able to describe it. That it was far from being an industrious life will be understood; occasional visits to the sick poor and the rendering of services to the secular clergy of the diocese constituted the whole of their work outside. In our own church there was only one sermon per week, and there were six friars to share the work. Hence the greater portion of the day was at the personal disposal of the priests; and, as manual labour was considered beneath the sacerdotal dignity, and their crude education had given them, with few exceptions, little or no taste for study, they were always eager for distractions. They were frequently to be met rowing or sailing on the lakes (always in their brown habits), or driving on side-cars through the loveliest parts of Kerry; and in return the parish priests whom they visited or assisted paid frequent visits to the friary and helped the monks to fill up an idle hour with a cigar and a glass of whisky. A few years later, indeed, a large-minded superior of this friary converted a conservatory that stood in the centre of the garden into a cosy smoking-room.

In point of fact both whisky and tobacco were forbidden in our constitutions, but I have never yet seen a constitution in which a theologian could not find a loophole and pass through it with unruffled dignity. Our professor of theology used to tell a genial story (against the casuist) of an old lady at Glasgow who lost her purse, and prayed that it might not fall into the hands of a theologian. The conviviality of the priests, in our days, was confined to a small room at a safe distance from our wing of the house, but we frequently met one of the younger priests moving stealthily along the corridor with the neck of a bottle peeping out from his mantle, and often, as we lay awake at midnight, we caught the faint echo from the distant room of "Killarney" or "The Dear Little Shamrock."

The penances, too, were an interesting feature of the life, when observed in the case of one's companions. The common form of public penance is to kneel in the centre of the refectory during dinner, praying silently with arms outstretched, until the superior gives permission to rise. The next in point of severity is to kneel without the hood, or with an inscription stating one's crime, or with the fragments of anything one has broken. For graver faults, especially of insubordination, a culprit is condemned to eat his dinner on the floor in the centre, the observed of all observers, for one or more days; and for an exaggerated offence his diet is restricted to bread and water. Confinement to the monastery for a long period, suspension from sacerdotal functions, and, ultimately, expulsion from the order, are the more grievous forms of punishment. Though monastic constitutions still direct that each monastery must have its "prison," I do not think that formal incarceration is now practised in any part of the world. Apart, however, from these penances the whole scheme of discipline is crushing and degrading. For speaking a word in time of silence a novice would be forced to carry a stick in his mouth during recreation; he would be called upon at any time, for no fault whatever (and generally just in proportion as he was intelligent and sensitive), to stand against the wall or in a corner of the room and make a fool of himself in the most idiotic fashion. Everything is done to expel the last particle of what is commonly called self-respect, to distort and pervert character according to a stupid mediæval ideal. I remember once nearly bringing my monastic career to a very early close by a transgression of this supreme command of blind obedience. I had been asked a question which would implicate a colleague—in a trivial matter—and I refused out of a sense of honour to reply. If I had not apologised afterwards in a public and humiliating fashion I should have been expelled at once.

Thus the twelve months passed monotonously, and the time approached for us to take the "simple vows." The votes of the community are taken every three months on the merits of candidates for the order. The community is assembled for the purpose in the chapter room (a room in which the superior assembles his religious three times a week for prayer, exhortation, and public confession of their minor faults—breaking utensils, oversleeping, &c.) and the superior invites a discussion on the merits or demerits of the novice. He then produces a bag of white and black marbles, of which he gives a pair to each voter; they are collected with great secrecy in two bags, and if the novice does not obtain a majority of “white balls” he is invited to abandon his intention. If it is probable that he will be “blackballed,” he is usually warned in advance: hence it very rarely happens.

Our votes having been satisfactorily obtained we prepared to make our religious profession at the completion of our year of probation. The profession, an impressive religious ceremony, consists essentially of a vow to observe the rule of St. Francis and to “live in poverty, chastity,¹ and obedience for the whole time of our lives.” When the morning arrived, a large and sympathetic congregation had gathered in the church, and the sight of the six young friars—mere boys we all were—solemnly forswearing every earthly desire moved them deeply. The purport of the vow was explained to them in the exhortation given by the superior, and they at least knew the extent of the sacrifice we were making. We, too, were convinced that we fully realised the gravity of the step; as, although our thoughts were taken up rather with the glamour of the position we ultimately sought and the advantages it offered, we were not in our way insensible of the price we were asked to pay. But it was many a long year before the act could be appreciated—not until long after we had solemnly and irrevocably ratified our vows.

What are the world and the flesh to a boy of sixteen, or even to a youth of nineteen (at which age the final, irrevocable step is taken), who has been confined in an ecclesiastical institution from his thirteenth year? He knows little more of the life which he sacrifices so lightly with his vow of poverty than he does of life on Mars; and he is, when he utters his vow of celibacy, entirely unacquainted with the passion that will one day throb in every fibre of his being, and transform the world beyond conception. He has signed a blank cheque, on which nature may one day write a fearful sum. Yet he is permitted, nay persuaded, to make that blind sacrifice, and place himself in lifelong antagonism to the deepest forces of his being, before he can have the faintest idea of his moral strength. If it be true that monastic life is ever sinking into corruption, we should feel more inclined to pity than to blame the monks.

The secular clergy make no vow of poverty or obedience, and it may be urged that even their vow of celibacy is more defensible. The seminary student makes his vow when he is admitted to the subdiaconate, the first of the holy orders, and the canonical and usual age of the subdeacon is twenty-one. The average youth of twenty-one may be admitted to be capable, in ordinary circumstances, of forming an opinion on such matters, but we must remember that the ecclesiastical student has had an abnormal training. Every precaution has been taken to keep him in complete ignorance of sexual matters, and to defer the development of that faculty of which he is asked to make a lifelong sacrifice. He has never come in contact with the other sex, for even during his vacation the fear of scandal hangs like a millstone about him; he has never read a line concerning the most elementary facts and forces of life—his classics, his history, his very fiction, have been rigidly expurgated; the weekly minute confession of his thoughts, the incessant supervision of his superiors, the constant presence of innumerable threats, have combined to postpone the unfolding of his sex-life until he shall have blindly abdicated it for ever. In the confessional I have known students of a much more advanced age who were still sexually undeveloped. In fact, the Church knows that they are unconscious of sex, and expects them to be unconscious; for if she awaited the full development of mind and body in her candidates her clergy would never be sufficiently recruited as long as she insists on celibacy.

The proportion of nuns who take the vow of chastity at an early age is smaller, as I have said, but the sin is more grievous. The life of the nun who finds in later life that she has made a mistake is infinitely more wretched. The priest is in the world and frequently of it; the nun is jealously imprisoned in the walls of her convent. No doubt, her vow is usually only a "simple" vow and theoretically dispensable; but who ever knew a nun to write to Rome for a dispensation?

No woman would dare to face the ignominy of such a step. "Woe to him (or her) who draws back his hand from the plough" is one of the most inculcated maxims of the conventual life; and the prospect of returning, a failure, to one's family and friends is most forbidding.

I have never been able to witness without a shudder the ceremony of a young girl making her vows. Some comfortable monk or light-tongued Jesuit preaches to her from the altar of the tranquil joy of her future life as spouse of Christ alone, and the candid virginal eyes that are bent upon him tell only too clearly of her profound ignorance of the sleeping fires within her, the unknown joys of love and maternity which she sacrifices so readily. In ten years more she will know the meaning of the vow of chastity into which she has been deluded. It was brought home to me vividly on hearing one day the confession of a young nun who was in the wild throes of passion-birth. After enumerating the usual peccadilloes, she began to tell me of her utter misery and isolation. Her sisters were unkind, thoughtless, and jealous; "and yet, father," she urged piteously, "I do want some one to love me." I muttered the commonplaces of our literature; but as she knelt at my feet, looking sadly up at me, in their little convent chapel, I felt how dark a sin it was to admit an immature girl to a vow of chastity. How their parents—their mothers—can let them act thus, nay, can look on with smiles and congratulations, surpasses my comprehension. We read with shudders of the ancient Mexican sacrifices of maidens, yet hundreds of fine-natured girls are annually sacrificed on this perverse altar of chastity in England. They send home no word of unhappiness, it may be said. Do their parents not know that every letter they write must be given, open, to a superior? I doubt if France ever did a greater service to its women than when it (though not entirely) closed their convents.

CHAPTER IV

STUDENTSHIP

AFTER the novitiate had been successfully accomplished it was necessary to resume the course of our education. Owing to the total neglect of profane study which is foolishly directed, most of the ground we had already conquered was lost during the year of the novitiate. Latin was sustained, even advanced a step, since all our services and quasi-religious studies had been in Latin; although ecclesiastical Latin, and especially the Latin of the Psalms, of which we heard so much, would make the shade of Cicero shudder. Whatever other acquisitions had been made such as Greek and French were entirely lost. We had, therefore, to devote ourselves once more to "humanities," and for this purpose we were transferred (without a glimpse of the immortal lakes, for the friars had fallen on evil days with the bishop) to what is now the principal house of studies of the Franciscans at Forest Gate in East London.

The large and imposing pile of buildings which the friars have to-day at Forest Gate is often quoted as an illustration of the growth of Catholicism. Fifteen years ago (1882) there was no Catholic congregation in the locality; only a dozen worshippers made their way to the washhouse of the neighbouring nunnery, when the friars first came to celebrate mass there. When our party arrived three years afterwards the congregation numbered 300 souls; and when I left in 1896 the friars had erected property to the value of about £25,000, and ministered to a congregation of more than 3000 souls. As a matter of fact this was only a symptom of the decentralisation that was going on in London. There were few converts to Rome in the new congregation, and these were merely the flotsam and jetsam of superficial religious controversy—good people who would save their souls in any Church, or none. The great bulk of the parish were the middle-class Catholics who had migrated from all parts of East London to the new and healthier district, in which the sagacious friars had erected a church, mainly on borrowed funds.¹

The priest who was entrusted by the Belgian authorities with the supervision of our studies was Father David, since Minister-General of the entire Franciscan Order, and erudite counsellor to the Holy Office. An abler student than teacher—a distinction of which our authorities never dreamed—and a man of many interests, he contributed little more than the example of his great industry and learning to our development; and most of us were very barren soil for that seed. During the first six months no attempt was made to organise our work. All our religious exercises were hurried through early in the morning, making more than three consecutive hours of prayers of divers kinds; as a rule we then had the monastery to ourselves during the day. Once or twice a week, at any hour of the day or night, our professor would interrupt the course of his ministerial and parochial duties, and his studies of Sanscrit at the British Museum, to give us a class in Latin. Even during that half-hour he used to write letters, and we would purposely make the most atrocious blunders, and conduct ourselves in the wildest manner our imagination could suggest.

Our long Saturnalia came to an end at last with the arrival of a second and younger professor, who entered into the work of reform with alarming zeal. He was fresh from the Belgian province, in which a perfect discipline (from a mechanical point of view) prevails in the houses of study. Young, intensely earnest, and sincerely religious, he made an honest effort to reform us without losing our sympathy, but, as he knew little more of our studies than we did, and had an uncontrollable temper and a conspicuous harshness of character, he alienated us more and more as time went on. From Belgium, too, he had imported the system of espionage, which is deservedly odious to English students; he considered that the necessary rigour of monastic discipline justified it. However, he never cared to be caught in the act, and we gave him many an unpleasant quarter of an hour by running to the door of our study room when we saw his shadow near it, and chasing him through the convent in his anxiety not to be seen. At length we appealed to authority, and effected his deposition and removal. In later years I learned to esteem and respect him, and he made rapid progress in the order and in the London ministry; finally, however, he ended in an ignominious flight with the contents of the fraternal cash-box.

His successor was a monk of a very different character. Far from continuing the rigour of his predecessor, he became alarmingly liberal and familiar, and before many months had elapsed we found it impossible to retain a particle of respect for him. In point of fact he already showed symptoms of mental aberration, and a few years afterwards his conduct became so extraordinary that absolute dementia is the kindest interpretation of it. He, too, was removed at our appeal, and we began to have an evil reputation. During our five years of study at Forest Gate we succeeded in removing no less than six professors and superiors; and, since I was the "dean" of the students throughout my course, I attracted an uncomplimentary interest. I have no doubt that my own fall was frequently predicted many years in advance.

After twelve months at Latin we were initiated into a course of rhetoric. The Jesuits more wisely postpone the rhetorical studies until the last year; in any case, it is little more than a waste of time. Lessons in elocution and declamation are clearly expedient, and should be insisted upon much more conscientiously than they are in the training of priests, but the usual "course of rhetoric" is only learned to be forgotten. It deals with the invention and distribution of arguments, the analysis and composition of orations, the various styles of discourse, figures of speech, and the comparative play of ideas and emotions. There are few who retain any knowledge of its multitudinous rules when the period of practice arrives; fewer still who pay the slightest attention to them. The only useful element of the training is the practice of making ecclesiastical students prepare and deliver short sermons to their companions. In many monasteries the students preach to the assembled community during dinner. It affords excellent training for public speaking, for one who is able to speak with any degree of self-possession to a small audience will have little fear of a large congregation. I often preached to a congregation of a thousand people with the utmost composure, yet trembled before a congregation of ten or twelve persons.

The course of rhetoric is succeeded by a course of scholastic philosophy. In the great mediæval schools philosophy was taught in conjunction with theology, but the rationalistic spirit, which had been so vigorously expressed by Abélard, and the growing importance of the Moorish thinkers, led gradually to the separation of philosophy. By the sixteenth century, when there was a notable revival of speculative activity, the separation of philosophy from theology was complete. In a rationalistic age like ours such a separation is imperative. Before a positive revelation can be entertained, certain preliminary truths, especially the existence, nature, and authority of the Revealer, must necessarily be established by pure reasoning; in other words, philosophy must precede theology, and this is now fully recognised by the Church.

The scholastic philosophy which is now taught in Catholic seminaries usually includes treatises on logic, metaphysics, and natural ethics. First is given a short treatise on dialectics, which differs little from the logic of Jevons or Whateley, and is followed by a more careful study of the second or material part of logic. A treatise of general metaphysics follows, in which are discussed, analysed, and vindicated the general concepts and principles which will be used subsequently in the construction of the desired theses. Special metaphysics is divided into three parts, cosmology, psychology and natural theology. It opens with a proof of the existence of the material world, against the Idealists, and discusses its origin and its features of time and space; then the question of life is entered upon, its origin and nature discussed, and the two great branches of the organic world are philosophically described and commented upon. The second part, psychology, is concerned with the human soul; it seeks to prove its spirituality and immortality, against the Materialist, classifies and analyses its various faculties, treats of the origin and nature of thoughts, emotions, and volitions. The third part treats of God; it opens with the usual demonstration of his existence, against the Agnostics, endeavours to elucidate his attributes as far as mere reasoning will avail (and the scholastic philosopher is persuaded that it will avail much), and considers his relations to this nether world.

The line of reasoning throughout is taken closely from Aristotle—or, as Renan would say, from a bad Latin translation of an Arabic paraphrase of a Syriac version of Aristotle. Until the time of Thomas Aquinas, all Catholic philosophers (except Boetius) had followed Plato, and regarded Aristotle with suspicion; St. Thomas, however, and all the schoolmen, except St. Bonaventure, rejected the Platonist method and introduced Aristotle (through the Latin translations of the Arabic school), expurgated his philosophy, and enlarged it in certain directions in harmony with Christian teaching. Thus the Neo-Scholastic philosophy is fundamentally the philosophy of Aristotle enlarged by allusions to modern problems and philosophies, and usually enriched with a moderate acquaintance with modern science. The Jesuits of Stoneyhurst have published (in English) an excellent series of manuals of the Neo-Scholastic philosophy at its best.

To logic and metaphysics is usually added a treatise on natural ethics, which is founded on the Nicomachean ethics. It deals with the abstract conceptions of right and duty, virtue and vice, law and conscience; discusses the various current theories of moral obligation; and expounds and enforces the various duties which arise from the relations of individual, social, and international life. Since no appeal to revelation is admitted in it, and in order to distinguish it from moral theology (which covers the same ground in the light of revelation and authority), the treatise goes by the name of natural ethics.

Customary as it is to decry the scholastic philosophy, I would willingly subscribe to the generous appreciation of it by Mill and Hamilton as a mental discipline. Its chief defect is its narrow and arrogant exclusivism. That the system is strongly and skillfully constructed is what one would expect from the number of gifted minds that have contributed to it; but almost every manual from which it is taught, and nearly every professor, carefully excludes, or only gives a most inaccurate version of, rival philosophies. The impression made on the student is that the scholastic system is so clearly and uniquely true that all opponents are either feeble-minded or dishonest; the latter theory is only too often urged. When I afterwards became professor of philosophy I made it my duty to study more modern systems, and learned how petty and antiquated the scholastic system is in comparison. Even one who had taken a degree in it could hardly read such writers as Lotze or Royce.

And, indeed, apart from the fact that all opponents are on the Index¹ (in that they write "expressly against the faith"), and that it would be a sacrilege to entertain for a moment the possibility of their being in the right, the time which is devoted to the vast subject is wholly inadequate. Two years is the usual duration of the course; one year is very frequently the limit of philosophical study. Then the ages of the students must be taken into account. They are generally youths of from eighteen to twenty-one, who are quite incompetent to enter seriously into such grave problems; only one in a hundred makes an attempt to do so. Sufficient information to satisfy an examiner is committed to memory; but, unless the student is drawn to the science for a solution of questions that have arisen in his own soul (which is very rarely the case), he shirks philosophy as far as possible, and looks forward eagerly to his deliverance from it. Further, it is supposed to be taught through the medium of a dead language, and most of the professors in the seminaries have very little acquaintance with modern science. They are also injudicious in that, neglecting the problems of actual interest and importance, they fritter away the allotted time in the most trivial controversies. The liberty of the will or the existence of God will be dismissed in a day, and a week will be zealously devoted to the question whether substance and personality are two distinct entities, or whether the qualities of a thing are physically, formally, or mentally distinct from its substance. In many seminaries a certain amount of physical science is taught in conjunction with the course of philosophy, but much jealousy is shown with regard to it. I was much attracted to the empirical sciences from the beginning, and, though not actually impeded, I was much discouraged in that pursuit; I was informed that the empirical sciences made the mind "mechanical," and predisposed to materialism. F. David, though not actually my professor, guided my studies with great kindness throughout my course. Although I fortunately broke loose from his influence in some directions, and found that I had subsequently to verify with care whatever I had accepted from him, I was certainly much indebted to him for the formation of habits of industry and precision.

The priest who was nominally entrusted with our philosophical training is certainly not responsible for the fatal depth to which I ultimately penetrated. One of the few things he had not mastered was metaphysics; he could paint and play, and he was an authority on architecture, archæology, rubrics, canon law, and history. He was a Belgian friar of pronounced eccentricity, and his method of teaching philosophy was original. After each lesson he dictated in Latin a number of questions and answers, and on the following morning the answers had to be repeated word for word. Some of my fellow-students passed a most satisfactory examination at the end of the term without having a single idea on philosophical questions. The worthy father was another victim of our seditious movements, and his eccentricities enabled us to make his life a serious burden. He, for instance, hated meeting anybody on our broad staircases, and we haunted the stairs. He lived mainly on hard toast, and we at times stole some of it and scrunched it in the most silent intervals of dinner, to the delight of his colleagues.

The last three or four years of the student's career are devoted to theology. Under that title are usually comprised ecclesiastical history, canon law, Scripture, and moral and dogmatic theology. Ecclesiastical history, usually a very one-sided version of the vicissitudes of the Church, does not, as a rule, occupy much of the time. Canon law, a vast system of ecclesiastical legislation, is either neglected or only given in a very rudimentary fashion. Each order and diocese secures one or two experts in the subject, who are appealed to in case of complications, but the majority of the clergy are content with the slight knowledge of canon law which they necessarily glean from their moral theology. The three years are, therefore, devoted to Scripture and theology proper. In my course not a single lesson of Canon Law was given.

With four lectures each week during a period of two or three years it is impossible to study satisfactorily more than a comparatively small section of the Scriptures. Certain books are selected, after a general introduction, for detailed commentary, and the students are supposed to study the exegetical method in order to cover the rest of the ground at their leisure.

How far is the study of Scripture in the Church of Rome affected by the Higher Criticism (and the monuments)? Very profoundly, in point of fact, though this modification of views can find no expression since the celebrated retrograde encyclical of Leo XIII. Newman's contention, that there were obiter dicta in Scripture which did not fall under the inspiring influence, introduced a far-reaching principle; it was not necessary to hold that all was inspired. In face of the stern criticism of the Rationalists many had begun to admit scientific and historical errors in Scripture, and the famous French professor, M. Loisy, went very far in company with the critics. Then came the Pope's encyclical, declaring that no errors could be admitted in Scripture, and M. Loisy disappeared from his chair (with, it is true, a most suave and courteous letter in his pocket, recognising his past services, from the Pope). However, an encyclical only affects the expressions, not the thoughts, of scholarly Catholics. Leo XIII. has never once claimed to exercise his infallible authority. His encyclicals enjoy no more than his personal authority as a theologian, and that is not serious. The bulk of the faithful are impressed by his utterances, both on the ground of their wisdom and under the erroneous impression that they, according to Catholic theology, share to some degree the prestige of his supernatural power. There are no degrees in infallibility. Catholic scholars are waiting patiently until Cardinal Vanutelli, or some broader-minded man, assumes the tiara.

In the meantime, on this Scriptural question, they have a refuge in the elasticity of the term "inspiration." The advanced thinker may give it any interpretation his views may require. A very able professor of Scripture at Louvain University told me that his own ideas on Scripture were absolutely chaotic on account of this vagueness of the fundamental idea. Another distinguished professor saw in it a line of dignified retreat for the Papacy when the time came. What the commission which is now sitting on the Biblical question at the Vatican may determine cannot be conjectured. But the private opinion of the leading spirit in that commission is not unknown to me. "The truth is," I recollect Father David saying to me, when Mr. Sayce's "Higher Criticism and the Monuments" appeared, "the truth is that the Old Testament was not written for us, and the sooner the Church can quietly drop it overboard the better."¹

Moral theology has been detached from dogmatic in the specialisation of studies, and forms a distinct science of a purely practical nature. It opens with a few general treatises on moral responsibility, conscience, law, and sin, which constitute what is called fundamental theology. The special treatises which follow discuss the obligations of the moral agent in every conceivable relation and circumstance. Each treatise usually takes a particular virtue as its object, and enumerates every possible transgression of the same, discussing their comparative gravity, and frequently giving practical rules to the confessor in dealing with them. There is a treatise on impurity, which gives the student the physiological elements of the subject, and enumerates (with the crudest details) the interminable catalogue of forms of vice, the professor usually supplementing the treatise from his own experience in the confessional. There are also treatises on charity, on justice (a voluminous treatise which descends into the minutest details of conjugal, social, and commercial life), on veracity, and all other virtues.

Throughout the preceding section on virtues and vices, which usually forms a quarto volume of 500 or 600 pages, little appeal is made to positive revelation. The judgments of the theologian are supported from time to time by texts of Scripture and references to ecclesiastical legislation, but the main portion of the work is purely ethical and rational. The second section, however, another quarto volume of 500 pages, discusses the seven sacraments of the Church of Rome, the vast number of obligations they entail in practical life, the transgressions which arise from their neglect or abuse, and their theory and practice. The principal treatises are the two that deal with confession and matrimony. In the one the future confessor receives the necessary directions for his task (a much more complicated one than is commonly supposed); in the other the many impediments to marriage, on the Catholic view, are discussed, as well as the dispensations from them, and there is a further discussion of conjugal relations. The path throughout is beset with the innumerable conflicts of theologians, and every point is profusely illustrated with real or fictitious "cases."

Moral theology is regarded as the most important of sacerdotal studies, and in many monastic orders it is the only study that is seriously cultivated. Young priests have annual examinations in it for many years after their ordination, and throughout life the priest has to attend periodical conferences, which are held in every monastery and diocese, for the discussion of points of casuistry. Our professor was a young man of much ability and refinement of character, who lectured on the cruder sections with marked confusion and apology, but, as a rule, priests soon acquire the habit of discussing indelicate "cases" with the calmness of a medical man.

Much as we were attached to our professor for his kindness and charm of character, we had to procure his removal at the end of a year. Though a man of more than average ability, he was too weak and unsuited for the monastic condition to fill his position with credit. The dull, oppressive environment gradually led him to drink, and he died an unhappy and premature death.

For our course of dogmatic theology we had the able guidance of Father David. He was a man of wide erudition and considerable mental power, and held us, with one or two exceptions, magnetically bound to him during our studentship. It was a curious fact that nearly all of his students withdrew themselves from his influence in later years. The change seemed to be due to the subsequent discovery of the inaccuracy of many of the statements we had taken from him—want of practice in writing and a shrinking from criticism had encouraged a certain degree of carelessness in his expressions—and partly to the fact that his early kindness and assistance had too much of an element of patronage and authority to survive in maturer years. Personally I was the most indebted to his guidance, and was the last of my course to remain under his influence. He had a remarkable grasp of dogmatic theology, because he had a thorough knowledge of the scholastic philosophy, which pervades and unites its entire structure. For dogmatic theology takes the student in hand at the point at which philosophy has left him; it is, in fact, merely revelation set in a philosophical frame. The various points of dogma which are contained (or supposed to be contained) in Scripture, were first selected by the Fathers, and developed, generally by the aid of the Neo-Platonic philosophy, into formidable structures. The schoolmen completed the synthesis with the aid of the Peripatetic philosophy, and elaborated the whole into a vast scheme which they called theology. The purely philosophical problems which arose have been extracted, and now form the distinct science of metaphysics; the ethical questions have been separated and formed into a moral theology; the speculative science which remains, still wholly philosophical in form and largely so in argument, is dogmatic theology.

Much space is occupied with the conflicts of rival schools of theologians, especially of the Thomists, or followers of St. Thomas (chiefly the Dominicans and Jesuits—though Thomism is in general favour just now, since the Pope has declared for St. Thomas), and the Scotists (Franciscans) or followers of the Franciscan Duns Scotus. These rival groups quarrel about every question that the Church has left undefined. One important result of these divisions is that grave questions of living interest are only imperfectly grasped by theologians until the world has moved on a step, and they then ungracefully follow it. Their time is chiefly occupied with questions that are fitly illustrated by the problem of the number of angels that could stand on a needle's point.

Through this scheme of education every aspirant to the Roman Catholic priesthood must pass. In the larger seminaries and more prosperous congregations the programme is carried out with great fidelity, and the more brilliant students are sent on to the universities (Washington, Louvain, Innsbruck, Freiburg, and Rome) for more advanced courses. The smaller seminaries and minor congregations, who are ever pressed for priests, curtail the scheme very freely; philosophy is all but omitted, dogmatic theology is reduced to the indispensable minimum, and moral theology is carefully pruned of its luxurious growth of superfluous controversies. In the case of monastic orders, whose work consists almost entirely in missionary and parochial activity amongst the poor, the Church connives at a lower standard of education.

In the Franciscan Order the constitutions, from which its admirers usually but wrongly derive their information of its practices, generously prescribe three years for philosophy and four for theology. In few branches of the order are more than five years devoted to the higher studies. In England we were the pioneers of a new system, and from first to last our studies were irregular and stunted. We spent five years as students at Forest Gate, of which fifteen months were devoted to classics and rhetoric, fifteen months to philosophy, and two years and a half to theology. During that period our life differed little from the model described in the preceding chapter. We rose at a quarter to five, dragged through the long programme of religious services, and commenced study at eight; six or seven hours per day were devoted to study, and the remainder of the time was occupied as I have described.

We had taken the irrevocable vows three years after leaving the novitiate. One of our number had obtained papal release from his "simple" vows, but most of us looked forward eagerly to the priesthood, the "end of study," as we equivocally called it, and we found means to enliven the dull and insanitary life that had to be traversed first. No vacation is allowed during the whole of the period, but once or twice a week we had the luxury of divesting ourselves of the heavy robe and taking long walks in ordinary clerical attire, and once or twice a year we were granted a whole-day holiday to some pleasant spot. This was in the later years. At the commencement of the period we had ample practical illustration of the meaning of a vow of poverty—which is more than the modern mendicant friar anticipates. Under one superior, a very mediocre friar, who had been put into office to serve the purpose of a diplomatic and ambitious higher superior, our diet and clothing became painfully appropriate to our profession of mendicancy. His parsimony and real lack of money were neatly concealed behind a cheerful profession and praise of "holy poverty" before which all complaint was stultified. However, our congregation, and the income of our church increased, so that "holy poverty" was laid aside in favour of more humane sentiments. Our diet became generous and substantial, our beer and wine more expensive, and a heating apparatus was introduced; we almost attained the ordinary level of modern monastic life.

Still the life was extremely insanitary, and there was much sickness amongst us. During three years we lost six of our young men, and almost all of us entered upon our active career with deeply impaired constitutions. Our medical attendant waged a constant but fruitless war with our superiors to procure a saner recreation for us; at his demand for exercise we were furnished with picks and shovels and turned into our garden. One huge mound of earth afforded us exercise for four years; one superior desired to see it in a central heap, his successor fancied it in the form of a Roman camp, and a third directed us to form an entrenchment along the side of the garden with it. But the root of the evil was far deeper than they cared to recognise; it lay in the isolation, the dull, soul-benumbing oppression of the monastic life.

The sick were treated with great kindness, as a rule, but, naturally, with little skill and effectiveness; for no woman is, under any conceivable circumstances, allowed to enter the monastery. In a serious illness which befell me I had painful experience of that aspect of celibate life. The custards and beef-tea which the doctor had ordered were made by our cook of corn-flour and somebody's essence of beef (the cook had the laudable intention of saving time for his prayers); and even when certain lady friends outside had taken the responsibility for my diet, I still had the equivocal blessing of "fraternal" nursing. The lay-brother who acted as my infirmarian, a good, rough, kind-hearted fellow, like most of his class, had been a collier before his conversion, and, though he made a strained effort to be gentle and soothing, his big horny hands lent themselves very badly to the work. However, no expense was spared in the care of the sick, and most superiors were extremely kind and considerate in their treatment.

The constant changes of the inmates of the monastery also afford some relief to the monotony of the life. Elections are held every eighteen months, at which changes of superiors are made and monks are transferred from one monastery to another. For months in advance the convents are thrown into a fever of excitement over the issues. Discontented inferiors are afforded an opportunity of venting their grievances, as a commissioner, or "visitator," is sent from Rome, who has a strictly secret and confidential talk with every friar in the province before the election takes place. In some monasteries and nunneries the superior is elected for life, and in such cases he is usually chosen by the inmates themselves with great care. In our fraternity, and in many other congregations, the local superiors, or "guardians," of the various monasteries were appointed by a higher council, as I will describe later, and had to hand in their resignations at the end of eighteen months; if their record was satisfactory, they might be re-elected for a time. The frequent change is a matter of general satisfaction, for no superior ever succeeds in gaining the sympathy of an entire community. One of the kindest and ablest superiors we ever had, Father Bede, a man of exceptionally earnest, sincere, and unworldly life, only retained the position for a year and a half, and at the end of that term was with great difficulty dissuaded from leaving our province altogether. There was a great deal of intrigue afoot always in connection with the elections.

Feast-days also helped to break the monotony of the life. Even in our poorest days the higher festivals were celebrated with much gaiety and opulent meals; for there are always plenty of thoughtful friends, and usually a nunnery or two, in the neighbourhood of a friary to supply the defects of the masculine cuisine on special occasions. On such days the law of silence is suspended at dinner, and the friars join in a general conversation and raillery; often, too, an impromptu concert is added, and the songs of bygone days re-echo through the cloisters. Our refectory was prudently located, as is usual, at the back of the house, and far from profane ears. Wine is poured out in abundance; in our days of poverty it was weak Rhine wine or an inferior port, but with the return of prosperity (and the advent of a generous benefactress), good port and whisky, and a fair quantity of champagne, made their appearance. We students also were liberally supplied with wine, and, as some religiously declined it, others drank too generously. Youths in their teens, who had never seen wine in their homes, drank their half-bottle once or twice a month. A lamentable proportion of them became immoderate drinkers.

The long preparation for the priesthood is divided into stages marked by the reception of the preliminary orders. In the Church of Rome there are seven orders through which the cleric must pass, four minor and three major or "holy" orders. In the early Church each order marked a certain category of officials in which the candidate for the priesthood was detained for some time. The first ceremony, the giving of the "tonsure," in which the bishop symbolically cuts five locks of hair from the head of the neophyte, is a formal initiation into the ranks of the clergy. Whilst the hair is being cut the youth repeats after the bishop the words, "The Lord is the part of my inheritance," for the "cleric" is one who has chosen the part (cleros) of the Lord. After a time he passes through the four minor orders, and becomes successively doorkeeper, reader, exorcist, and acolyte. To-day the tonsure and the minor orders are usually given in one ceremony, for the lower offices have been partly absorbed in the higher, and partly committed to non-clerics. But the conservatism of the Church still insists on the orders being taken and their functions discharged at least once; so that the newly appointed doorkeeper, for instance, must march ceremoniously to the church door, which he opens and shuts, and rings the bell, before the bishop will proceed to make him reader. The function of exorcist can now only be discharged by a priest, with the permission of the bishop in each case. In the west of Ireland, where belief in diabolical interference and the power of the priest is still very profound, exorcisms are not infrequent. But they are not unknown in enlightened London. A case came to my knowledge recently in which Cardinal Vaughan contemplated exorcising a man, but the spirit threatened to do such serious internal damage before departing that the ceremony was abandoned.

The subdiaconate is usually received at the age of twenty-one, and the diaconate in the following year. In the monastic orders, where the vow of celibacy has already been pronounced, these ceremonies are comparatively unimportant, but to the secular student the subdiaconate is a fateful step; the vow is made by taking a step forward in the sanctuary at the invitation of the bishop, and many a student has withdrawn at the last moment. The long ceremony of ordination is impressive and ridiculous in turns. It contains many beautiful prayers and symbolic rites, but it retains parts—such as the exhortations to the candidates (who rarely understand the muttered Latin) and the interrogation of the people (who would almost commit a sacrilege if they replied) about the merits of the candidates—which have long ceased to have any force whatever.

Two years are supposed to elapse between the diaconate and the priesthood, but we received the three major orders within the same six months. Ecclesiastical laws can always be suspended by Rome in unusual circumstances, and the extraordinary extent to which clerical regulations are over-ruled to-day indicates on what evil days the Church has fallen.

CHAPTER V

PRIESTHOOD

A CONSIDERATION of the scheme of study which has been described would lead to the impression that Roman Catholic priests must be in a highly satisfactory condition of intellectual equipment. No other priesthood has, or ever had, a longer and more systematic course of training. For ten years, on the average, the candidate is under the exclusive control of the ecclesiastical authorities—authorities who have the advantage of an indefinitely long and world-wide experience in training their neophytes and a religious authority over them. Their scheme of education, indeed, does seem perfectly constructed for the attainment of their particular object.

Yet it is generally recognised that the Catholic priesthood, as a body, are not at all remarkable for their attainments and their intellectual training. Their system is admirable on paper, but it evidently breaks down somewhere. That this widely-felt impression of their inferiority is not a lingering trace of the ancient prejudice against Rome is clear from the fact that Englishmen notice the inferiority more particularly outside of England, where Roman Catholic priests do not present themselves in the light of schismatical intruders. And it is placed beyond all doubt by the circumstance that the feeling is largely shared, and has been emphatically expressed, by the Roman Catholic laity. The correspondence columns of their journals frequently contain appeals for the better education of the clergy. The broad fact that, with the wider diffusion of modern thought, the theological army has struck its flag, and retreated from point after point, implies a grave defect even in the leading thinkers of the Church, as the laity are quick to perceive. It is not surprising, therefore, to find the ordinary clergy much behind the age in questions of general interest.

The last sermon I preached in a Catholic church (that of St. Antony, at Forest Gate) was an appeal for the higher education of the clergy. I urged that modern thought had entirely changed the position of the religious teacher, and had made it necessary to have a regard for intellectual as well as moral training; and I freely denounced the actual ignorance of the clergy. My mind had already passed from the Roman Catholic faith, and I spoke strongly and sincerely on the subject. My colleagues feebly congratulated me afterwards, but the laymen of the congregation actually sent a deputy to assure me of their gratitude and their admiration of my bold expression of their sentiments. On the following evening, after a scientific lecture I gave them, I spoke on the subject to a group of educated laymen, and found them deeply moved on the question. Certainly the clergy of St. Antony's (four of whom were professors) were not below the average. In most of the churches of that part of London the clergy were far more ignorant, and even among communities of priests who have wealth and leisure, like the Jesuits or Oratorians, there are few who have even a superficial knowledge of modern science, history, or philosophy. The impression was confirmed wherever one listened to Catholic sermons or entered into serious conversation with the priests.

The reasons of this signal failure of a fine educational scheme may be deduced partly from what has preceded. The system is unproductive, in the first instance, on account of the youth and immaturity of the students. At nineteen, when they should still be polishing their wit on Homer, or Tacitus, or Euclid, they are gravely attacking the profoundest problems of metaphysics. A well-educated man of thirty-two, who had a brief course of philosophy under F. David, told me that he felt as if he were handling blocks of granite which he was unable to penetrate; our usual students never even realised that they were handling "blocks of granite." Out of several groups of students who passed through my hands only one boy had an idea of the meaning of philosophy. He confessed to me that it was because, like myself, he was tormented by religious doubt from an early age. Before he reaches the age of twenty-four the student has traversed the whole vast system of scholastic philosophy and theology, with its innumerable secondary problems and controversies. He has his opinions formed upon hundreds of subjects, and knows what to think of every philosophical and religious system that has ever been invented, if it be ancient enough. He will have very little opportunity and less competence to reconsider his opinions afterwards.

But the studies are not even conducted at the ages and with the intervals prescribed by the ecclesiastical legislation; the scarcity of priests (the raritas voca- tionum of which the Pope speaks), induces authorities unduly to accelerate and curtail the course of the higher studies. Every diocese and nearly every religious congregation in England and the States is insufficiently manned. Thousands of baptized Catholics are allowed to drift for want of clergy, and bishops not infrequently in despair accept priests who have been expelled from other dioceses or congregations. It is true that scores of priests are sent to convert the natives of Borneo, or to bargain with rival missionaries over the fortunate Ugandians, and that strenuous efforts are made to touch the consciences of respectable adherents of other Churches; but the fact remains that in both London and New York tens of thousands of poor Catholics have drifted for want of priests and chapels. This leads inevitably to pressure in the seminaries and curtailment of the studies.

And it is not merely to procure "labourers for the vineyard" that the studies are deplorably mutilated; another, and a rather curious motive of hurry is found in certain congregations at least. Certainly in the Franciscan Order students were prematurely advanced to the priesthood for the sake of earning money by their masses. A mass, of course, cannot be sold; that would be simony. But a priest will say mass for you or your intention if you make him a present of half-a-crown. He may say it gratuitously if he pleases, but the English bishops have decreed that if a priest accepts a "stipend" at all he must not take less than half-a-crown. Now every friar is bound to say mass for his superior's intention, and the superior, having to provide for the community, secures as many and as "fat" stipends as he possibly can. As a friar is bound to say mass every morning he is worth at least £1 per week on that count alone; in fact, at Forest Gate, where we were six priests, more than £400 was obtained annually in stipends for masses. As a priest, however young he may be, says mass daily from the day of his ordination, the anxiety of the superior to see him ordained is easily understood. A student is an onus on the community; he must be made productive as soon as possible.

Under such conditions it is not strange that their educational system leads to such unsatisfactory results. Numbers of young priests are annually discharged upon humanity with full powers to condemn and anathematise, and an intense itching to do so. They soon find that the "crude and undigested mass" they have learned is a burden to themselves and a source of pain to their long-suffering audience. In their eagerness to be subtle they teach rank heresy, trouble timid consciences, and hurt themselves against episcopal authority. Then they abandon study entirely, thinking it useless for their purpose. Mr. Jerome has a caricature somewhere of the newly fledged Anglican curate. The young evangelist stands at a table on which are cigarettes and brandy and soda; his books are on sale or exchange, "owner having no further use for same." The skit is entirely applicable to the average priest.

The canonical age for ordination is twenty-four, and it is probably the average age; but this precaution is nullified by the facility with which dispensations are granted. The bishop can dispense at twenty-three, and the Roman authorities readily grant a dispensation once the candidate has reached the age of twenty-two and two months. Most of our friars began to earn their pound per week at the age of twenty-two or twenty-three. Under one provincial bishop, it is said that there was always a brood of half-fledged priests, who went by the name of "Sovereign Pontiffs"; they used to be sent to sing mass on Sundays for priests who were absent or unwell, and the bishop always exacted a sovereign for their services. The usual term of reproach for such immature priests is, "Praesta quaesumus"—an allusion to the fact that they cannot do more than say mass, for the expression is a common beginning of mass-prayers.

The ordination is preceded by an episcopal examination in theology. Before the subdiaconate the student must present one treatise on theology for examination; he must prepare two for the diaconate and three for the priesthood. The examination is, however, little more than a test of the memory and industry of the aspirant; if he knows the defined points of Catholic doctrine on the subjects taken, little more is expected of him. And students are usually careful to select the shortest treatises for presentation, and to carry the same treatise through three examinations. Still aspirants are occasionally "ploughed"; though, judging from the preposterous answers of certain successful students whom I have seen at the tribunal, it is difficult to conceive the possibility of failure.

The ceremony of ordination, which may be witnessed on Ember Saturdays in Catholic cathedrals, is very long and highly symbolical. In fact, it has developed to such an alarming extent that no theologian can say in what the "essence" of the ordination really consists; there are innumerable controversies as to which rites are essential to the validity of the sacrament. From the readiness of the theologian to pass judgment on Anglican orders one would imagine that he knew the conditions of validity without hesitation; the truth is, that in the case of each of the three "sacred orders," theologians differ emphatically as to the essential parts of the ordination. Students are usually in a state of terror about the numerous possibilities of the invalidity of their ordination, and even bishops betray much nervous anxiety in the matter; the ceremony is sometimes repeated for general satisfaction. A curious story in illustration of the strange contingencies that affect the validity of orders is told of a French bishop. He had exercised episcopal functions for many years, when one day his old nurse was heard to boast that she had baptized him (in periculo), and that she had not used common water, but rose-water for the purpose. The baptism was invalid; his subsequent confirmation and ordination were invalid, for baptism is an indispensable condition of receiving the other sacraments; all the ordinations he had ever held were invalid, and had to be repeated; and all the masses, absolutions, &c., performed by himself and his priests during that period had been invalid.

A further source of confusion is found in the need for what is called "jurisdiction" before certain of the priestly functions can be validly used. At ordination the priest receives the power to say mass, and not even the Papacy can withdraw this (though it may forbid him to exercise it). On the Catholic theory I still possess that power in full, and if I seriously utter the words, "Hoc est enim corpus meum" over the piece of bread I am eating (for that is the essential part of the mass) it is changed forthwith into the living body of Christ: it is seriously believed on the Continent that apostate priests frequently consecrate for the so-called Satanists and Freemasons. However, the power of absolving from sin is not of the same character; it is only radically received in the ceremony of ordination, and the validity of its exercise is entirely dependent upon ecclesiastical authority. M. Zola, most patient and accurate of inquirers, has overlooked this distinction; in "Lourdes" the Abbé Pierre is made to hear Marie's confession when he has no jurisdiction over her and could not validly absolve her.¹

A second examination (in casuistry) is necessary before "faculties" to hear confessions are granted, which is usually some time after ordination. And jurisdiction is limited to the diocese of the bishop who gives faculties, and may be still further restricted at his pleasure: nunneries and boarding-schools are always excepted from it; and there are always a certain number of sins the absolution of which the bishop reserves for himself. In some dioceses the list of "reserved cases" is long and interesting: it usually comprises the sins which are most prevalent in a district. The confessor must, in such cases, write to the bishop for power to absolve, and tell the penitent to return to him. In London four cases are reserved: immoral advances by a priest to women in the confessional, frequentation of theatres by a priest,² murder,

¹ A non-Catholic writer is almost certain to stumble in liturgical matters. M. Zola's administration of the sacraments to the dying—to the pilgrim in the train in "Lourdes," and to Count Dario in "Rome"—is quite incorrect. It has never been pointed out, too, that the moon's conduct, during Pierre's three last nights in Rome, is out of all bounds of astronomical propriety.

² It must not be supposed that every priest one sees in a London and connection with a secret society. Two cases which are always reserved to the Pope will be treated in the next chapter.

For a long period after his ordination the priest's activity is confined to saying mass every morning. He is not indeed bound to say mass every morning; he is compelled to hear mass every Sunday by the general law, but there is no clear obligation for him to exercise his power to consecrate.¹ But the young priest says it daily during the years of his primitive fervour, and many continue the practice faithfully throughout life. Monastic priests are usually bound by their constitutions to say mass daily. It would be wiser to allow them liberty in that respect. Priests soon contract the habit of hurrying through their mass at a speed which ill harmonises with its solemn character. In fact, the Church has been forced to legislate on the point, and forbid the saying of mass in less than twenty minutes for an ordinary, and fifteen minutes for a "black" ² mass (for the dead). No doubt a priest works up to a high rate of speed largely out of anxiety to meet the wishes of his congregation, yet the sight is distressing to one who knows how much is squeezed into the twenty minutes. An ordinary worshipper theatre has incurred this. The law is local only in action, and does not apply to visitors—say, from the States.

¹ So that Zola is wrong in imputing it as a fault that the priests at Lourdes omitted to say mass.

² A black mass—in which the priest wears black vestments—is shorter than usual: hence it is that black vestments so often adorn the shoulders of an ordinary secular priest. Green vestments are worn on a common, saintless day; red for a martyr or the Holy Ghost; white for virgins, confessors, and all great feasts; purple for sadder festivals; and gold for any purpose.

merely sees the rapid irreverent genuflections and the desperate hand movements which are supposed to be crosses over the sacrament, but the mutilation of the prayers is much more deplorable: nearly all are direct and more or less familiar petitions to the Almighty, and one cannot but hope (for the priest's sake) that he is wholly unconscious of the meaning of his orisons. It is difficult, no doubt, when a large congregation is shifting uneasily on the benches, and perhaps another priest is frowning upon you from the chancel, waiting for his turn. Certainly there are very many priests who acquit themselves with edifying devotion, but the majority run through their mass (apart from pressure) in the allotted twenty minutes; and, since it takes a priest nearly an hour to say mass in his early practising days, one can imagine at what price the high speed is obtained.

The mass is rendered rather ludicrous sometimes from an opposite reason—through its undue prolongation and interruption by musical accompaniment. The High Mass only differs from the daily Low Mass in the number of assistants and the musical rendering of some of the parts. It is utterly incongruous from the purely religious point of view that the celebrant should interrupt his solemn rites, whilst he and his congregation listen to the florid strains of Haydn or Gounod, operatically rendered by soulless singers who have no idea of the meaning of their words, and are very frequently non-Catholics. Pope Leo XIII. did endeavour to bring about a reform, but he must have realised that it is the music and display that fill the Catholic churches.

At the same time it must be said that the Church does not do all in its power to make the mass (and other ceremonies) appeal to the priest. It retains a number of vestments and rites that have ceased to have any meaning. The "humeral veil," which is worn over the shoulders by the sub-deacon at mass and by the priest at Benediction, is a curious survival of the once intelligible custom of drawing a veil across the sanctuary at the most solemn moments; the maniple, an embroidered cloth that dangles at the priest's left elbow, and is a similarly atrophied relic of the primitive handkerchief, is now not only unmeaning but gravely inconvenient. The practice of solemnly facing the people to sing the epistle and gospel in Latin, and other such survivals of ancient custom, are interesting from an archæological point of view, but they ought to have been changed centuries ago; indeed, no serious defence can be made of the use of Latin at all in the Church of Rome.

Ecclesiastical Latin is, of course, easy, yet it is a fact that many priests know so little Latin of any kind that many parts of the mass and Office are quite meaningless to them. I remember a country priest who was invited to bless a churn. He took the book of (Latin) benedictions to the farm, and donned his surplice. Not knowing the Latin for a churn (which may be excused) he pitched upon a "Benedictio thalami" as probably referring to a churn, and read the "Blessing of a marriage bed," with the usual solemnity, over the churn of cream.¹ Certainly some of the sequences in the mass and many of the hymns in the Breviary are beyond the capacity of a large number of priests.

And it must be admitted that no familiarity with Latin will enable the priest to attach a meaning to certain portions of the liturgy—especially to some of the psalms. The approved Latin version of the Psalter is a disgraceful performance; yet it has been used for 1600 years, and there is no question of changing it. St. Jerome, an expert Hebraist, offered an excellent translation in his classical Latin, but the monks knew the old Psalter by heart and would not change; hence the first translation of the psalms into bad Latin by very imperfect Hebrew scholars endures to this day. Some of the psalms—notably the 58th—contain unmitigated absurdities; the verse “Kings of armies have fled, have fled” is rendered, “King of virtues, beloved, beloved”; verse 13 runs, “If you sleep in the middle of the lots, the wings of the dove are silvered,” &c. There are many similar verses. Yet the good old monks, who doubtless found many deep symbolical meanings in the above, clung to the version, and their modern successors may be excused for wool-gathering during their chanting.

About forty psalms enter into the daily “Office” which the priest has to recite. One often sees a secular priest mumbling over his Breviary in train or omnibus; he is bound to form the words with his lips, she was safely delivered of twins shortly afterwards. In Belgium I was severely censured for sending to a dentist a young woman who came to me with a severe toothache, and an old lady, who had diseased cows, to a veterinary surgeon. I incurred grave suspicion of rationalism from my colleagues.

at least. The monks, however, recite their Office in their choir, or private chapel, which is fitted with stalls, like a cathedral. The two sides take up the alternate verses of the psalms, chanting the words in a loud monotone; it is only sung on solemn occasions. The whole of it is set to music, and in such inactive monasteries as the Carthusians, where it is a question what to do with one's time, the whole is sung daily. It takes about three hours to chant it in the ordinary monotone, and no normal human mind could remain in real prayer so long. Indeed, the facility with which the two rows of chanting friars could be thrown into fits of laughter was a clear symptom of vacuity. Even during our novitiate we were frequently convulsed with laughter at the entanglements of an elderly friar who read the prayers at breakneck speed. At London one day our instructor, who led one side of the choir, suddenly raised the tone about an octave in the middle of the psalm. The head superior, who led the other side, disagreed with him (as usual). We were afraid to join with either, for they were equally formidable to us, so we listened with interest as they continued the psalm to the end, chanting alternate verses at a distance of an octave and a half. Deaf elderly friars also caused distraction by going ahead in complete unconsciousness of the pauses of the rest of the community.

And if there was much to be desired in these religious offices which were of a private character it will be readily imagined that their public services were not more satisfactory. It is impossible to expect a continuous ecstasy during the long hours which monks and nuns devote to prayer every day; and since most of the psalms do not vary from day to day, the very monotony of the services would stand in the way of any very serious devotion. In fact, the idea of following the sense of the words recited day after day for hours together was so forbidding that it was frankly given up by our spiritual writers; they were content to urge us to prepare in advance lines of religious thought to follow while we were chanting which would have no connection with the Office itself. We tried to do so. But the early riser who passes some London monastery in the small hours of a winter morning, and catches the sound of the solemn chant breaking on the sleepy air, must not too hastily conclude that here is a focus of intense spiritual thought which should work—if only telepathically (as some think to-day)—for the betterment of life. The religious exercises of the friars must be cut down by two-thirds before they can become really spiritual.

But in the public ceremonies a new distracting element is introduced—the presence of closely observant spectators; it were not in human nature to be insensible of their presence. The sanctuary becomes a stage; and strive how he may to think of higher things, the ordinary mortal cannot banish the thought that some hundreds, perhaps thousands, of reverent eyes are bent upon his every movement. The Catholic sanctuary, with its myriads of burning tapers, its fragrant incense, its glory of colour in flowers and vestments, compels attention. Every line of the church converges to the altar and the priest. Hence it is not surprising to find that there is a great deal of formalism and purely dramatic effect in sanctuary work. No one, probably, will think much of the grave and devout expressions of the ministers. It is a part of their discipline to cultivate such an expression, and it soon becomes automatic. In point of fact, there are few who are not keenly concerned about the material success of their function—their singing, their deportment, and appearance. At such a time as Holy Week, for instance, the feverish anxiety for the success of the elaborate services runs so high that one may safely say they are quite unattended with religious feeling in the sanctuary. Ceremonies and music are practised for weeks in advance, and, when the time comes, celebrants are too busy and too nervous to think of more than the merely mechanical or theatrical part of the devotions.

And the same thought applies, naturally, to preaching; it runs on the same lines in the Church of Rome as in every other church. There are deeply religious preachers whose only serious thought is for the good of their hearers, as they conceive it; there are preachers who think only of making a flattering impression on their audience, or who are utterly indifferent what effect or impression they produce; the vast majority strive to benefit their hearers, and are not unassisted in their efforts by a very natural feeling of self-interest. I heard a typical story of one a few years ago. The priest in question is one of the most familiar figures in Catholic circles in the north of England, an ardent zealot for the "conversion" of England, and, I believe, a very earnest and worthy man. On this occasion he was preaching in the open air to a large special congregation who had made a pilgrimage to some Roman Catholic resort. The preacher seemed to be carried away by his feelings. My informant, however, a keen critic of elocution, noticed that one gesture—a graceful sweep of the wide-sleeved arm—was unduly prolonged, and, looking more closely, he saw that the preacher was signalling to a photographer in the opposite corner of the quadrangle. The preacher told him afterwards that he had arranged to be photographed at this specially prepared gesture. The photographer had been so captivated by the sermon that he had to be recalled to his duty by the orator himself. I also remember being grievously shocked once in my early days at one of the London “stars.” I happened to be near the door when he re-entered the cloister after a very fervent discourse, and he immediately burst out with the exclamation, “Now, where is that glass of port!” Five years later I used to feel grateful myself for a glass of port after preaching. It is not an apostolic practice, but this is not an apostolic age, and it only merits contempt when it professes to be such.

If the priest has an educated congregation he usually prepares his sermon with care. The sermons are rarely original, for there is a vast library of sermonnaires at the disposal of the Catholic priest, but it is often written out in full; though it is never read from the pulpit, as is done in Anglican congregations. Good preaching is, however, rather the exception than the rule; though the age of martyrs has passed away, a Catholic can always find a sufficient test of his faith in the shape of an indifferent preacher who insists on thinking that he needs two three-quarters of an hour sermons every Sunday. In poor parishes the sermons usually degenerate into intolerable harangues. A priest who had charge of a large poor mission told me that he always prepared his sermon the hour before it was delivered: he took a cup of tea, lit a cigar, opened the gospel of the day and thought dreamily over it, then he ascended the pulpit and preached for half-an-hour. Men of wide erudition and facility of utterance would often preach most impressive sermons at a few minutes' notice; others, of an ascetic, earnest, contemplative type, would also preach sound and rational moral discourses without preparation. The practice of preaching the same sermon many times is, of course, widely prevalent. I remember one old friar fondly kissing a much worn manuscript after a sermon on St. Joseph: "God bless it," he said, "that is the sixty-third time I have preached it."

There are many other functions in which the priest finds it difficult to sustain the becoming attitude. Confession will be treated in the next chapter; Extreme Unction is a ceremony in which only a keener faith than we usually meet to-day can take a religious interest. But it is in the ceremony of baptism, especially, that the most unreasonable rites survive and the most diverting incidents occur. There is, for instance, a long series of questions to be put to the sponsors, and the Church, unmindful apparently of the march of time, still insists on their being put in Latin (and answered by the priest) and repeated afterwards in English. One lay-brother who used to assist me in baptizing thought it more proper that he should learn the Latin responses, instead of allowing me to answer myself. Unfortunately he muddled the dialogues, and to my query: "Dost thou believe in God the Father," &c.? he answered, with proud emphasis, "Abrenuntio—I renounce him."

I was, however, little occupied with sacerdotal functions. Even before my ordination I had been appointed to the chair of philosophy, and as soon as I became a priest I entered upon my duties as professor. My interest in philosophy had been noticed by the authorities, and probably attributed to a natural taste for the subject. The truth was that I was tormented with doubt, and I knew that philosophy alone could furnish the cure—if cure there was. My doubts had commenced six years previously, in the novitiate. I can remember almost the hour, almost the spot in the monastic garden, when, on a fine winter's day, as I chanted to myself the eternal refrain of our ascetic literature, "Ye shall receive a hundred-fold in heaven," the fatal question fell across my mind like a lightning-shaft, to sear and torture for many a weary year. I had dutifully confessed my state of mind to my superior. Kind and earnest as he was, he had nevertheless little capacity for such emergencies; he made me kneel at his feet in his cell and, after severely pointing out the conceit of a boy daring to have doubts—holding up the exemplary faith of Wiseman, Newman, &c.—he discharged me with the usual admonition to stifle immediately any further temptation of that character. He acted upon the received ascetical principle that there are two kinds of temptations which must be fled from, not met and fought, namely, temptations against purity and temptations against faith: in the second case the rule is certainly dishonest. Indeed, thoughtful priests do not recognise it, though it is sanctioned, in theory and practice, by the majority.

My scepticism increased; it was partly an effect of temperament, partly a natural desire to verify the opinions which I found myself acting upon. At London I immediately put myself under the guidance of F. David, and for seven years he was informed, almost weekly, of the growth of my thoughts. Though most intimate with him I never allowed him to make any allusion to my difficulties outside the confessional, but, in confession, I spent many hours propounding my difficulties and listening with sincere attention to his replies. As time went on I began to feel that I had exhausted his apologetical resources, that he had but the old threadbare formulæ to oppose to my ever-deepening difficulties. I became, therefore, more dependent upon my own studies; and, as my difficulties were wholly philosophical, I devoted myself with untiring energy to the study of scholastic philosophy. If, in later years, I did not appeal to F. David when the crisis came, it was because I was firmly convinced that I had, in private and in public lectures, heard all that he had to say on the subject. He was the only man who knew that my secession was not the work of one day, but the final step in a bitter conflict of ten long painful years. All that my colleagues knew was that I was ever reticent and gloomy (which was, I think, attributed to pride and to sickness), and that I was strangely enamoured of metaphysics; I was, accordingly, appointed professor of that subject.

In due time I received jurisdiction and commenced the full exercise of sacerdotal power. A monastic superior has the power of examining his own subjects, and thus practically dispensing with the episcopal examinations. Knowing that I was not a zealous student of casuistry, F. David kindly undertook my examination; he asked me the formula of absolution (which I did not know) one day when I met him in the cloister, and then sent me up to the Vicar-General as "examined and found worthy." I then immediately entered the mysterious and much-dreaded confessional. How does one feel on entering upon that unique experience? I remember the emotion, but am incompetent to analyse it. I only know that as I sat for the first time in "the box" awaiting the first penitent I was benumbed, not exalted, with a vague, elemental, un-rational excitement. Behind me lay my long and minute book-knowledge of all the conceivable transgressions of man, woman, or child; before me vaguely outstretched the living world, as few see it. Then came the quick step, the opening of the door, the rustle of a dress—one last tremor, and the sensation was gone for ever.

Preaching and other functions also commenced. I was fully launched on my sacerdotal career. But the confessional is a subject for more careful study.

CHAPTER VI

THE CONFESSIONAL

No point in the vast and contentious system of the Church of Rome has excited, and still excites, a deeper and a less flattering interest than the practice of auricular confession. The Inquisition and the commerce in relics and indulgences (though this commerce is by no means extinct) are still favourite subjects of the historical critic. Monasticism, the Index, the use of a dead language, political ambition and secular intrigue, are some of its actual features which attract no small amount of opprobrium, and even try the patience of many of its own adherents. But the chief butt of the innumerable anti-papal lecturers and pamphleteers is the confessional. The air of mystery and secrecy is a necessary evil of the confessional, and it is a feature that provokes bitter criticism. A Catholic layman cannot, of course, with delicacy enlarge upon his own experience of the confessional, and in any case it would be too personal to be effective. No ex-priest has hitherto given his impressions of the institution, and no priest would venture to express an unfavourable opinion upon it, or any opinion of a circumstantial character, for fear of alarming his co-religionists.

Yet, in point of fact, there is no reason in the nature of things why even an actual confessor should not write a most ample and detailed account of his experiences. The "seal of confession" is not merely a sacramental obligation; it is a natural obligation which no ex-priest would ever dream of violating. But the obligation has certain limits which are explicitly defined in theological works, and are practically observed by priests. The obligation is merely to maintain such secrecy about confessional matters as shall prevent the knowledge of the crime of a definite individual; within those limits the obligation is absolute, and admits of no possible excuse in the smallest matter. The priest is not even allowed to use a probability in his own favour in this question. He is forbidden under an obligation of the gravest possible character to say a single word or perform any action whatever from which the declaration of his penitent might possibly be inferred. Hence he cannot, under any conceivable circumstances, act upon the information he has received. If a priest learned from the confession of his servant that she had put poison in the wine he was to take for dinner, Catholic theology directs that he must not even change the bottle, but act precisely as if he had heard nothing. I never heard of a test case, though it is well known that there have been martyrs to the seal of confession. In less important matters the confessor interprets his obligation generously. One of our friars, the superior of a monastery, interrupted an inferior who was confessing to him, and made him stand up and repeat apart from his confession a certain fault for which he wished to inflict a public penance. It was a breach of the seal, though my colleague was too subtle a casuist to admit it. I remember a priest who was confessor to an acquaintance of mine once saying to me of her: "Miss ——— seems to be very well educated; she speaks quite smoothly on the most delicate points." I doubt whether my friend would have cared for me to know so much of her confession.

However, once the danger of identifying the individual penitent is precluded, the confessor is free to make whatever use he pleases of his knowledge. Theological writers admonish him that it is extremely imprudent to discuss such matters before laymen, but that is only part of the discretion of the priest with regard to the laity, and carries no moral obligation. Amongst themselves priests discuss their interesting experiences very freely; and the professor of casuistry is usually a man of wide experience, who gives his students the full benefit thereof. In their conferences (discussion-meetings) the clergy talk freely of their experiences. It is a common practice of missionaries to discuss the relative wickedness of town and country, and of large cities or localities in a city. Such commentaries, however, are carefully restricted to sacerdotal circles; there is no doubt that any departure from the policy of unqualified secrecy would deeply impair the fidelity of the laity, and tend to withdraw them from that greatest engine of sacerdotal influence, the confessional.

And there is another reason why confessors have not thought it necessary to enter into the controversy to any important extent. The attacks upon the confessional have usually defeated their own object by emphasising too strongly the accidental rather than the inherent and essential evil of the institution.

Dark stories—which may quite possibly be true in some cases—are circulated in connection with it, and the impression is at once urged that such practices are a normal, or at least a large part, of what is hidden under the veil of secrecy. The generalisation is fatal, for the Catholic apologist has little difficulty in pointing out the impossibility of such a state of things; besides, the days are happily gone by when the Catholic priesthood as a body could be accused of systematic and conscious immorality. The main contention of the critic having been thus met and answered, attention is diverted from the real evil of the confessional, which is not sufficiently realised by those who are unfamiliar with it.

The structures which are found in every Catholic church for the purpose of hearing confessions quite exclude the cruder anti-papal view on the subject. The penitent usually remains in sight of the congregation, but in any case priest and penitent are separated by a complete partition; a wire gauze-work, about eighteen inches square, which is set into the partition, enables them to talk in whispers, but contact is impossible. These “boxes,” or confessionals, may be inspected in any church. In hearing the confessions of nuns the precautions are usually still more stringent; the confessor is locked in a kind of bureau, the nun remaining entirely outside. But it is a fact that the priest is not bound to hear every confession in the “box,” and that he frequently hears them in less guarded places. I have heard the confessions of a whole community of nuns where no such precautions existed; they entered singly and entirely unobserved into the room where I sat to hear them. Their usual confessor was a venerable and sedate old priest, and it was either forgotten, or thought unnecessary, to alter the arrangement for me. During certain hours on Saturday the priest sits in his box for all comers. Outside those hours he will hear confessions in the sacristy (where I have known a liaison to be systematically pursued under that pretence) or anywhere, and the anti-papal lecturer may find serious ground for reflection in that section of his practice.

Confessions are also frequently heard at the residences of penitents. The Church does not sanction the practice with regard to people who are capable of attending church, but it is frequently necessary to hear the confessions of persons who are confined to bed. The priest is urged in such cases to leave doors open and take various precautions to avoid scandal, but those directions are seldom acted upon and would not be appreciated, as a rule, by the penitent herself. Cases are known to me in which women have feigned or exaggerated illness for the purpose of bringing the priest to their room—with his connivance or at his suggestion—and a liaison of priest and penitent has long been maintained in that way. But such appointments are attended with danger, and cannot be widespread.

I do not believe that there is any large amount of immorality in connection with the confessional; the legislation of the Church on that point is stringent and effective, and the priest is well aware that the confessional is the worst place in the world for him to indulge improper tendencies. He is involved in a network of regulations, and sooner or later his misconduct is bound to come to the knowledge of his authorities, with very disastrous consequences to himself. In the first place, as I explained in the last chapter, improper suggestion on the part of the confessor is a sin reserved to the bishop. He cannot say mass until he has received absolution (I am assuming that he has not lost all sense of obligation¹), and no brother priest can absolve him from his fault. He must have recourse to the bishop; and it is safe to presume that he will not relapse for a considerable period. In the second place, he is deprived of the power of absolving his accomplice. An attempt to do so is a sin reserved to the Pope; and, as every Catholic woman knows that such absolution is invalid, the misconduct is once more liable to come to the cognisance of the authorities. The second sin which is reserved to the Pope is a false denunciation of a confessor by a woman, so that one has a guarantee of the genuineness of such denunciations as are actually made.

Thus it is obviously ill-advised for the unfaithful priest to make an evil use of the confessional, for the danger of exposure is sternly prohibitive. A devout Roman Catholic is horrified at the very speculation; an impartial thinker, whose estimate of human nature is neither unduly raised by thoughts of special graces nor depressed by prejudice, will think of priests as men more than usually exposed to temptation and burdened with an enforced celibacy, but will give them credit, on the whole, for an honest effort to realise that higher integrity which they profess. He will not think them superhuman with the Catholic, nor inhuman with certain Protestants. He will not believe that any of their habitual practices are inherently immoral, but he will expect the occasional lapses from which no large body of men can be free.

The priest's danger is not in the confessional. It is the same as that of any voluntary celibate, though, in the light of what has been said about the age of taking the vow, perhaps we ought to call him an involuntary celibate. The fact that from time immemorial ecclesiastical legislation has returned again and again to the question of priests' servants is instructive enough. From the thirteenth century onward the Church has recognised a vast deal of this kind of immorality, and I am aware that there is much of it in England to-day, even where the housekeeper is a relative of the priest. Further, the house-to-house visits of the priest, and the visits he receives, are made to ladies; the priest is idle in the hours when the husband is employed. From the nature of the case, however, it is impossible to make positive statements in this matter.

Whatever may be said of the general integrity of the priest's life,¹ it may be safely admitted that the occasional transgressions of his vow in connection with the confessional have been grossly exaggerated. And one unfortunate consequence of the excess is that it has diverted attention from the real evil of the confessional. It is bad enough for adult men and women (apart from the few who really desire it) to have to kneel weekly or monthly at the feet of a priest (usually a man they know intimately), and tell every unworthy thought and act into which they have been betrayed; for girls and young women to discuss their inmost thoughts and feelings with such a man is vicious and lamentable. If they are of a refined temper the practice causes them much pain, and often leads to duplicity or to actual debasement; to those of a coarser complexion the temptation to abuse the occasion is very severe.

When I first began to hear confessions I was much impressed with the number of girls who unburdened their minds to me (I was almost a stranger to them) of some long-concealed transgression of an indelicate character. A Catholic girl usually chooses a particular confessor (we were six in number at Forest Gate), and presents herself at his box every week, fortnight, or month. The priest learns to recognise her voice, if he does not know her already, and counts her amongst his regular penitents, of whom every confessor is proud to have a certain number. Week after week she comes with her slender list of the usual feminine frailties—fibs, temper, and backbiting. At last she is betrayed into some graver fault, or something which she imagines (usually after it has taken place) to be serious. She is unable to reveal it to her ordinary confessor after her long immunity from serious sin has won her a certain esteem from him. If she goes to another confessor, her habitual director will learn it, for she is bound to say how long it is since her last confession. He will draw an obvious conclusion; some confessors go so far as to exact a repetition of the confession to themselves. She therefore conceals the sin, and continues her confessions and communions for months, even years, without confessing it. Now each such confession and communion, she has been taught, is as vile a sin as murder or adultery. She goes through life with her soul in her hands and the awful picture of a Catholic hell burning deeper into her; until at last, in an agony of fear, she crouches one day in the corner of the box and falters out the dread secret of her breaking heart. And it must be remembered that the subject of so much pain is often no real sin at all. The most unavoidable feelings and acts are confused with the most vicious practices, and sometimes regarded as "mortal sins."

But a yet sadder category is the large number of girls who are actually corrupted by the practice of confession. Girls who would never dream of talking to their companions, even to their sisters or mothers on certain points, will talk without the least restraint to the priest. They are taught when young that such is the intention of Christ; that in the confessional every irregular movement (and to their vaguely disciplined moral sense the category embraces the whole of sexual physiology) must be revealed. They are reminded that nothing superfluous must be added, yet that the sense of shame in the confessional must be regarded as a grave temptation of the evil one. So they learn to control it, then to lay it aside temporarily, and finally to lose it. They begin to confer with each other on the subject, to compare the impressibility, the inquisitiveness, or the knowledge, of various confessors, and they make plots (they have admitted as much to me) to put embarrassing questions to priests.

I am not suggesting for a moment that Catholic women and girls are less sensitive or less moral than those under the influence of other religions. That would be an untruth. But quite certainly it is one of the evil influences in their lives that, although they at first manifest a quick sense of shame and delicacy, they are compelled by the confessor to be more minute and circumstantial in their narratives.¹ A girl will often try to slip her less delicate transgressions hurriedly between two common peccadilloes, and only accuse herself in a general way of having been "rude" or immodest. No confessor can allow such a general accusation to pass; he is bound to call her and question her minutely on the subject; for by some curious process of reasoning the Church of Rome has deduced from certain of Christ's words that the confessor, being judge, must have a detailed knowledge of every serious transgression before he can give absolution. The conversation which ensues can very well be imagined.

Finally, there is a still more curious and pitiable category of victims of the sacrament of penance. I speak again of women, because men may be roughly distributed into two simple classes; the small minority who are spiritually aided by the weekly discussion of their fallings and temptations, and the great majority to whom confession is a bore and a burden. The missionary priest who travels from parish to parish is often warned that certain women will come to confess who must be carefully handled. These are, in various degrees, monomaniacs of the system, and are found in every diocese. Sometimes they have a morbid love of denouncing priests to the bishop on a charge of solicitation; and in the hope of getting evidence they will entangle him in the crudest conversation. Sometimes they are women "with a history," which, in their morbid love of the secret conversation, they urge, freshly embroidered, upon every confessor they meet, and make him think that he has secured a Magdalen. Frequently they are mere novelists who deliberately invent the most shameless stories in order to gratify their craving for that peculiar conversation to which they have grown accustomed in the confessional.

In this I am, of course, relying to some extent on the larger experience of my older colleagues, but some pitiable cases linger in my own memory. Almost one of the first confessions which I received from a woman was a sordid and lengthy story of a liaison with one of my colleagues. She assured me that she had never told it before. When, however, after an hour of this conversation, I returned to the house, another priest, who had seen her leave my "box," asked me with a laugh: "How did you get on with Clara?" (I change the name, of course.) It appeared that, though her story was probably true, she had hawked it over London. Others confessed that they came to confession precisely on account of the sexual excitement it gave them; the effect was at times very perceptible. These are exceptional, but numerous, cases; so are the cases in which the confession is a real and valued spiritual aid. For the vast majority of Catholics it is a burden which they would gladly avoid if the Church did not force it on them.

This, then, is the essential, inalienable evil of the confessional as an obligatory and universal institution. It may not be so directly productive of gross acts as is frequently supposed, but it has a corruptive influence that is clear to all save those who have been familiar with it from childhood. And yet this system, of so grave a responsibility, has the most slender basis of all the institutions of the Church of Rome. The reasoning by which it is deduced from Scripture is a masterpiece of subtlety. "Whose sins ye shall forgive they are forgiven, and whose sins ye shall retain they are retained," is the sole text bearing on the subject. The Catholic method of inferring the obligation of confession from the latter part of the text is interesting, and yet very simple. The Apostles, the Church says, have the power of retaining sin; but if it were possible to obtain forgiveness in any other way than by absolution from the Apostles or their successors the power of retaining sin would be nugatory; therefore there is only one way of obtaining forgiveness—by absolution, after full confession. This argument is strengthened by one from tradition, from the fact that, in the fourth century, the Church claimed, against the Novatians, the power of absolving from all sins; but what was meant in the fourth century by confession and absolution is not quite clear even to Catholic theologians, and an outsider may be excused for not seeing the force of the argument. Certainly confession was not then obligatory.

The fact is that, when the Church first began (in the thirteenth century) to talk about the obligation of confession, it had not the same critical spirit to face which it has to-day. It found that a practice had somehow developed amongst the faithful which could be turned into a most powerful instrument, and it proceeded to make the practice obligatory. The newly founded religious orders were then administering their spiritual narcotics to humanity, and the law was accepted with docility. Hence, in our own day, when the Church must provide a more rational basis for its tenets and institutions, the search for proof of the divine sanction of the practice is found to be more than usually difficult to the expert interpreters of the Church of Rome.

Apart, however, from its feeble dogmatic defence, it is usual for preachers and writers to expatiate upon the moral advantages of the practice. Sermons on the subject are very frequent, for it is well known that many people are deterred by it from passing over to Rome. It is urged that confession gives a certain relief to the soul that is burdened with the consciousness of sin, and that it is a great preventive of disorder. That a large number of the Catholics of the higher spiritual type are helped by the weekly consultation with the confessor is unquestionable. All the saintly men and women of the Church who are universally esteemed to-day regarded the confessional as an important aid. In fact, one often meets non-Catholics of high moral sensitiveness who look with eager longing to the institution. That is certainly an argument for the admission of quite voluntary confession under circumstances of especial security, but it lends no support to the Roman law of compulsory confession.

On the other hand, the academic conclusion of the preacher, that the confessional is a preventive of sin, vanishes completely before facts which are patent to all. Catholics are neither more nor less moral than their non-Catholic fellows in any country where they mingle. To compare Catholic countries with Protestant would be useless. London and Berlin, if we may strike an average of conflicting opinions, are neither better nor worse than Madrid or Rome. Paris has not deteriorated, but rather improved, since it threw off the yoke of the Church. Milan, largely non-Catholic, is far more moral than Naples. Liverpool and Glasgow are much more Catholic than Manchester or London; yet missionaries admit that they are more vicious.¹ The truth is, that whilst the confessor can exercise a restraining influence over his habitual penitent (as a rule), the majority soon become so inured to the confession that it fails to deter them, and a certain number are actually encouraged to sin by the thought of the facility of absolution. The latter point has been strained by critics; it is by no means a general feature. But I have been informed by penitents on more than one occasion that they sinned more readily under the influence of this thought. In monastic or quasi-monastic institutions the weekly confession to the chaplain does exercise a degree of influence, but even here nature has its revenge. The temptation to conceal and the practice of concealing are so great that the Church prescribes that an "extraordinary confessor" shall be provided every three months, and that each monk or nun or cleric shall present himself. In discharging that function I have not only met cases of long concealment, as might be expected, but I have known the inmates deliberately to indulge in the prospect of my coming. All these facts must be set against the advantages of the confession for the spiritual elect¹; or, rather, they show that, whatever may be thought of confession in the abstract, the law of obligatory confession is a grave moral blunder. I have heard confessions in very many parts of England and abroad; I have read much casuistic literature that is permeated with confessional experience; I have conferred on the subject with missionaries who have heard hundreds of thousands of confessions, and I am convinced that the majority of Catholics are unaffected by the confessional. They are bound to confess once every year; if they wish to pass as men of ordinary piety they confess every month or oftener; but in the whirligig of life the confessional is forgotten, and has no influence whatever on their morality.

That the institution is a source of great power to the Church at large is easily understood: it creates a vast gulf between clergy and laity, and considerably accentuates the superiority of the former. But to a large number of individual priests the function is very distasteful. Apart from the obvious unpleasantness of the task, it is much more fatiguing than would be supposed. Three or four hours' continuous hearing I have found very exhausting, and a missionary has frequently to spend seven or eight hours a day in the box. Still there are many priests who show a great liking for the work, and they will sit for hours in their boxes waiting—one could not help comparing them to patient spiders—for the arrival of penitents.

The obligation of confessing commences at the age of seven years, and is incumbent upon every member of the Church, clergy and laity alike, even on the Pope, who has a simple, harmless Franciscan friar serving him in that capacity. The theory is that the obligation of confessing commences when the possibility of contracting grave sin is first developed, and in the eyes of the Church of Rome the average child of seven is capable of meriting eternal damnation by its acts. Needless to say, the confession of the average child of seven or eight is a farce. The children used to be conducted to us from the schools every three months, after a careful drilling from their teachers, but scarcely one child in ten had the faintest glimmering of an idea of the nature of absolution. Few of them could even be sufficiently instructed to fulfil the material part of the ceremony; they mixed the various parts of the formulæ in the most unintelligible fashion, and generally wished to retreat before they had received the essential object of their coming—absolution.

The method of the ceremony is described in any Roman Catholic prayer-book. The penitent first kneels for ten or fifteen minutes in the church and, with the aid of the minute catalogue of sins in his book, recalls his transgressions since his last confession. Entering the box, and usually asking the priest's blessing, he states the occasion of his last confession, so that the confessor may form a correct estimate of his sinfulness. He then states his faults, the number of times he has committed each, and any aggravating circumstances; if the confessor is not satisfied, he questions him and elicits further details. Then premising, as a rule, a few words of exhortation or reproof, he imposes a penance and dismisses him with absolution, after an act of sorrow and a promise to amend. According to Catholic doctrine the act of sorrow and the "purpose of amendment" are the vital and essential elements of the ceremony. The uttering of the formula by the priest—every Catholic is told repeatedly—is entirely useless unless the contrition and good resolve are present. This shows that the Church itself has not a mechanical conception of the confession; but it must be added that, in practice, the ordinary Catholic does constantly tend to rely on just such a conception of the mechanical efficacy of the rite. No money is ever exacted or received for absolution. The stories circulated by travellers of lists of prices of absolution seen in Continental churches are entirely devoid of foundation.¹ Further, an "indulgence" has no reference whatever to future sin, but is a remission of the purgatorial punishment due for sin committed, and already substantially forgiven by absolution, which the Church of Rome claims the power to give. That indulgences are still practically sold cannot be denied: not that a written indulgence is now ever handed over for so much hard cash¹—such bargains have proved too disastrous to the Church—but papal blessings, richly-indulged crosses and rosaries, &c., are well-known rewards of the generous alms-giver.

In Tyndall's "Sound" a curious instance is mentioned of a church in which certain acoustic peculiarities enabled the listener at a distant point to hear the whispers in the confessional; it is said that a husband in this way heard his own wife's confession. Such contingencies are foreseen and provided for in theological works. The seal of confession applies not only to the priest, but to every person who comes to a knowledge of confessional matter. It happens sometimes that the penitents waiting outside overhear the words of priest or penitent, especially when one or other is a little deaf. At a church in Manchester, ¹ Once more I don the white sheet—so little does even the priest know of Catholicism in Catholic lands. I have before me four indulgences which were bought in Spain for fifty, seventy-five, and 105 centimos each in the year 1902, and they bear that date. The Archbishop of Toledo issues millions of these every year, and money alone secures them. The Church calls the money an alms (to itself), and the indulgence a reward of the alms. One of these infamous papers is known in Spain as "the thieves' bula." It is the most expensive of the four (about 1s.). It assures the thief that, if he does not know the name of the owner of the ill-gotten property he has, the Church allows him to keep it in consideration of this alms. For valuable property large sums have to be paid.

Third edition.

one busy Saturday evening, the priest interrupted his labours to inquire the object of a scuffle outside his box. There was a quarrel—not uncommon—about precedence amongst the mixed crowd that waited their turn at the door. A boy was complaining of being deprived of his legitimate place, and when the priest's head appeared he exclaimed, "Please, father, I was next to the woman who stole the silk umbrella!" And in my young days I remember that, on one occasion, when we had been conducted to church for the purpose of confessing, we who were waiting our turn were startled to hear our stolid elderly confessor cry out, repeating with horrified emphasis some statement of his youthful penitent, "Eighty-three times!" We knew little about the seal in those days, and the boy did not grudge us the joke we had against him for many a day.

The "penance" which is inflicted usually consists of a few prayers. Corporal penances are now unknown outside of country districts in Spain or Italy (where one may still see a girl kneeling in chapel with a pointed reference to the seventh commandment pinned to her back), and even long and frequently repeated prayer is not now imposed in England or the States; the Irish peasant may be ordered to say daily for months the seven penitential psalms. I soon found, from the number of people who accused themselves of neglecting their penance, how useless it was to impose burdens; those who did not curtail it hurried through it with precipitate haste. For it is customary to kneel and say the penance immediately after the confession, and as there are some scores of idle witnesses, calculating the severity of the penance from the time expended on it, and thence inferring the gravity of the sin, brevity is a feature of some importance. Hence I never imposed more than five or six Pater Nosters. On one occasion I imposed the usual "Four Hail Marys" on a quiet, unoffending old priest. He was slightly deaf, and, changing his posture of deep humility, he looked up at me indignantly, exclaiming "Forty Hail Marys!"

Short penances were not the only deviation from our theological rules which I allowed myself; I soon abandoned the hateful practice of interrogating on malodorous subjects. At first when I heard a general accusation I merely asked whether the morbidity in question was serious or not (for if it were not serious there was no obligation to interrogate). I was, however, so indignantly repulsed when the lady did happen to have a lighter debt that I was compelled to resort to the usual dialogue. It was not long before I entirely abandoned the practice, and simply allowed my penitents to say what they thought necessary. The Church imposes on the priest the obligation of cross-examining under pain of mortal sin, so that I do not doubt that some of my perplexed colleagues will see in that "sin" the reason of the withdrawal of the light of faith from me. However, the institution had become repulsive to me, and I eagerly embraced an opportunity of escaping from it and other ministerial work by a course of study at Louvain University. There came a year when our studies were disorganised, and I had no students for philosophy. I gladly accepted an invitation to go and study oriental languages at Louvain.

CHAPTER VII

A YEAR AT LOUVAIN

LOUVAIN UNIVERSITY is the principal Roman Catholic university in the north of Europe. Nominally it is a centre of higher Catholic instruction for all the northern countries, including, until a recent date, the United States. However it is, in point of fact, little more than a national institution. The patriotic Germans naturally prefer their own vigorous, though less venerable, University of Innsbruck. Britons and Americans have always been represented in its colleges very sparsely, for they had been usually attracted to the fountain-head, to Rome, in their thirst for higher doctrine. Now America has its great Washington University, and English Catholicism has brought to an end its self-imposed banishment from Oxford and Cambridge. English ecclesiastics will, no doubt, continue to be sent into a more Catholic atmosphere abroad, and will continue to prefer Spain or Italy to Belgium. Still, Louvain could boast many nationalities amongst its 1600 students.

The long struggle between Catholicism and Liberalism in Belgium has had the effect of isolating Louvain as a distinctively Catholic university. The clerical party naturally concentrated upon it, with its long tradition of orthodoxy and its roll of illustrious names, and determined to exclude the liberalising tendencies which had either mastered, or threatened to master, the universities of Brussels, Ghent, &c. The control is exclusively clerical, both rector and vice-rector being high ecclesiastical dignitaries, and every orthodox family with a care for the correct training of its sons is expected to send them to Louvain.

But Louvain is by no means merely a centre for clerical training. Belgian Catholicism has fallen much too low to realise so ambitious a dream. During the year I spent there—1893-94—there were not more than fifty clerical students out of the 1600. Ecclesiastical studies were, therefore, working at a dead loss, for the theological staff was numerous and distinguished. The greater part of the students were in law or medicine, though there were also sections for engineering, brewery, and other technical branches. Moreover, the university suffered from the presence of a rival clerical establishment in the same town—conducted, of course, by the Jesuits. The Jesuits, the “thundering legion” of the ecclesiastical army, have one weakness from a disciplinary point of view; they never co-operate. “Aut Cæsar aut nullus” is their motto whenever they take the field. And so at Louvain, after, it is said, a long and fruitless effort to secure the monopoly of the university itself, they have erected a splendid and efficient college, in which the lectures are thrown open to outsiders, and from which a brilliant student is occasionally sent to throw down his glove to the university, to defend thirty or forty theses against the united phalanx of veteran professors. The Dominicans have also a large international college in the town, and the American bishops a fourth, in which European volunteers for the American missions are trained. The rivalry which results, although it does occasionally overflow the channel of fraternal charity, helps to sustain the vitality of the Belgian Church, and turns its attention from the rapid growth of Rationalism and Socialism.

One difference between the Belgian and the English system is that few of the students live in the colleges, scattered at intervals over the town, which form the university. These are usually only lecture halls, with their attendant rooms and museums; the students live in the houses of the townspeople, for the town exists merely for the accommodation of the university. The vice-president keeps a record of all houses and the addresses of the students, but the supervision is slight, and the liberty of the students great. A second and most important difference from English or American university life lies in the complete absence of athleticism. The Belgians are entirely averse to muscular exertion of any kind. I saw very little cycling, no cricket, no football, no rowing—nothing more active than skittles during the whole period; for “beer and skittles” is much more than a figurative ideal to the Belgians. Their free time, and they are not at all a studious race, is mainly spent in the estaminets, or beer houses; and, like German students, they consume enormous quantities of their national beverage and smoke unceasingly.

The ethical result of such a mode of life may be deduced from general physiological laws. The “rector magnificus” was a very able and estimable man, but of a retiring and studious character; the vice-rector, Mgr. Cartuyvels, was, however, an active and zealous disciplinarian, and, by means of a wide system of espionnage, he was tolerably acquainted with the condition of affairs. Still he was powerless to stem an inevitable tide, and indeed it was said that he was afraid to enforce his authority too sternly, lest he should drive more Catholics to the Liberal universities. The religion of the students did not seem to be of a much higher quality than their conduct. I was informed by a Louvain priest that at least 500 out of the 1500 did not attend mass on Sundays; and such attendance is obligatory and a test of communion in the Church of Rome. Like that of so many of our Irish neighbours in England, their faith needs the stimulus of a row or a riot over religious questions to bring it to consciousness. Once the Liberals or the Socialists fill the street with their anti-clerical, "À bas la calotte," the students are found to be Catholic to a man. Apart from these uncanonical, though not infrequent, ebullitions their piety is little exhibited.

The clerical students, who usually live in the colleges, are priests who have distinguished themselves in their ordinary theological course, and who have been sent by their respective bishops to graduate in theology, philosophy, or canon law. Few of them see the full term of a university career, as their bishops are compelled by financial and other pressure, if not by reports of the examiners, to withdraw them prematurely to the active work of the diocese. The successful student secures his licentiate at the end of the third year, and his bachelorship at the end of the fourth. He then ceases to follow the public lectures at the halls, and spends two years at the study of his subject, under the guidance of his late professor.

During that time he must write a Latin treatise on any theme he chooses. Finally, in the great hall, before a numerous audience, he wins his cap by defending a score of theses against the professors and any ecclesiastic who cares to oppose him. As every religious order, and consequently every school of philosophy and theology, is formidably represented in the town, very lively scenes are sometimes witnessed during the discussion of the theses. Certain controversies have had to be practically excluded from the list of debatable questions in order to avoid an undignified delay of the proceedings by the Dominicans and Jesuits in the gallery. The success of the student is, however, practically guaranteed by the mere fact of his presentation by a professor. The whole system differs little from what it was in medieval Louvain, and the divorce between modern Belgian culture and the Belgian Church is thus foolishly maintained by the clergy themselves.

The programme of clerical study at the university is identical in form with that of the seminaries, but the questions are treated more profoundly and exhaustively. Only one treatise is taken each year. Each question is thoroughly discussed, and subsidiary questions are treated which are crushed out of the briefer elementary course. It is like passing from Huxley's "Elements of Physiology" to the more exhaustive work of Kirk or Carpenter on the same subject. Then the philosopher has the advantage of attending, with the medical students, scientific courses under men who are eminent in their respective sciences (which, however, he rarely does), and a few of the students of theology and Scripture attend lectures in the Oriental languages under equally distinguished professors. In addition to these there are courses of Persian, Sanscrit, Chinese, &c., and courses of the higher literature of most European languages, and of Latin and Greek classics. There is, however, no degree corresponding to the English M.A., and literary studies are greatly neglected. All the clerical students are intended by their bishops to become professors in their seminaries, and, in addition to their degree in theology, they are directed to follow the particular course which will benefit them. Still a spirit of narrow utilitarianism pervades all ranks. The lay-students have a definite profession in view and have no superfluous industry to devote to other studies; the priests think of little else besides their theology or philosophy. There are a few disinterested worshippers at the shrine of philosophy and letters, but their number is comparatively small. The course of Sanscrit and Chinese ascribed to the distinguished student of those (and many other) languages, Mgr. de Harlez, seems to have a mythical existence. Persian is never demanded, and even Arabic (though the professor is an Arabic scholar of the first rank) is rarely taken. Hebrew must be studied by aspirants for theological degrees, but Syriac has few scholars. There were three of us who took the Syriac course in 1893, and of the three two were mendicant friars who paid no fee. It will appear presently that we received little more than we gave.

I was requested by my superior to follow the course of Hebrew under M. Van Hoonacker, and, taking advantage of the temporary interruption of my lectures on philosophy, I made my way to the monastery of our order at Louvain. I added a course of Syriac (in virtue of which I hoped to disturb my Anglican brethren over the Peschito version of the New Testament), an elementary course of biblical criticism, and an advanced course of scholastic philosophy.

The lectures on Hebrew and on biblical criticism were given by M. Van Hoonacker, an effective teacher and erudite scholar, who crossed swords (with more courage than success) with the great Kuenen. An abler professor of Hebrew we could not have had, and even in handling the delicate questions raised by the Higher Criticism he displayed much wealth of knowledge, a generous acquaintance with the writings of his opponents (Wellhausen, Kuenen, &c.), and much argumentative power. The subject marked on the programme was an introduction to the canon of Scripture; it was based upon the work of M. Loisy, and ran upon the traditional lines. But he quickly exhausted that subject and hastened to his favourite topic, the discussion, against Wellhausen, of the origin of the Jewish festivals. Of erudition he gave abundant proof, and he showed not a little ingenuity in research and in the grouping of arguments; but it was obvious that few of the students had any large view of the general issues at stake. All scribbled rapidly as the professor spoke (for we had no manual), and endeavoured to gather as much detailed information as would suffice for examination purposes.

In private intercourse I found him extremely kind and courteous, and he frequently spoke to me of the difficulty of his position as professor of biblical criticism, when the Church left us without any clearly defined doctrine about the nature and extent of inspiration in face of modern rationalism: he did not appreciate the liberty of thought which the Church wisely grants until secular science has reached its high-water mark and it knows what it can decide with security. The Pope's encyclical had not yet appeared, but I know that, as a theologian and an expert, he would have little internal respect for it.

The professor of Syriac (and of some parts of Scripture) was a man of a very different type. He was a very old man, Mgr. Lamy, a distinguished Syriac scholar, but a poor teacher, and one whose opinions on biblical questions were of the older days. Like M. Van Hoonacker, he took the first chapter of Genesis as a subject for translation, and devoted more time to his commentaries on the text than to its Syriac construction. The contrast was instructive. On the Monday morning we had the Hebrew professor's advanced and semi-rationalistic commentary, resolving the famous chapter into myths and allegories; the following morning, from the same pulpit, Mgr. Lamy religiously anathematised all that we had heard, and gave the literal interpretation so dear to the earlier generation. He was kind and earnest, but his method of teaching was so unfortunate that, after receiving one lecture a week for nine months, we knew little more than the Syriac alphabet. Toward the end of the term he startled us by commanding us to prepare for the next lecture a translation of a dozen lines of Syriac without vowel points! The sequel unhappily illustrates the average Flemish character as I met it among the clergy. We were three in number in the course, and it was my turn to read at the next lecture. But my companions, fearful of their own turn, endeavoured to persuade me not to attempt such a preposterous task. By dint of great exertion I copied out the translation of the passage and brought it to lecture on the following Tuesday, when my companion, a Flemish priest, snatched the paper from my hand and tore it in pieces.

The third professor whose lectures I followed, Mgr. Mercier, was a gentleman of refined and sympathetic character, and one of the ablest living exponents of Catholic philosophy. To a perfect knowledge of the scholastic philosophy he added a wide acquaintance with physical science (which can rarely be affirmed of the scholastic metaphysician) and a very fair estimate of modern rival schools of philosophy. Instead of wasting time on the absurd controversies of the medieval schools he made a continuous effort to face the deep metaphysical criticism of the German and English systems; with what success may be judged from his numerous writings on philosophical questions. During the year I attended, he took "Criteriology" as his subject; he considered it the most important section of philosophy in these days when, after 2000 years of faith, the Neo-Academic cry, "What is truth?" has revived in such earnest.

Unfortunately the modern sophist finds little earnest and disinterested attention, even in universities; modern students of the great science are widely removed from the restless zeal of Athens or Alexandria or medieval Paris. Mgr. Mercier is, moreover, burdened with an obligation to adhere to the teaching of St. Thomas, almost the least critical of the medieval theologians, but the present favourite at Rome. However, the Vatican keeps a jealous eye on Louvain since the outbreak of heterodoxy under the famous Ubahis some thirty years ago. It is still under the suspicion of Cartesianism in a mild form, but that is only a matter of concern to Jesuits and other philosophical rivals.

I experienced much kindness from Mgr. Mercier. Like most of the Walloons, he is more refined and sensitive than the Fleming usually is. Belgium is made up of two radically distinct and hostile races. The southern half is occupied by a French-speaking people (with a curious native Walloon language) whose characteristics are wholly French; while the northern race, the Flemings, are decidedly Teutonic, very hospitable, painfully candid and communicative, but usually coarse, material, and unsympathetic. The two races are nearly as hostile as the French and Germans whom they respectively resemble (though, I think, neither French nor Germans admit the affinity—the Germans have a great contempt for the Flemings). Louvain or Leuven is in Flemish territory, and Mgr. Mercier, justly suspecting that I was not at ease with my Teutonic brethren, offered to establish me in his own house, but my monastic regulations forbade it. Both through him and the other professors I have the kindest recollection of the university, from which, however, I was soon recalled.

A secondary object of my visit to Belgium was the opportunity it afforded of studying monastic life in all the tranquillity and fulness of development which it enjoys in a Catholic country. In England it was impossible to fulfil many of our obligations to the letter. It is a firm decree of a monastic order that the religious costume must never be laid aside. But it is still decreed in English law that any person wearing a monastic habit in the public streets shall be imprisoned; and, although the law has become a dead letter, experiment has shown the practice to be attended with grave inconveniences. Again, the Franciscan constitutions strictly forbid collective or individual ownership, and even the mere physical contact of money; but English law does not recognise the peculiar effects of a vow of poverty, and English railway companies and others are unwilling to accept a note from a religious superior instead of the coin of the realm, as the Belgian railways do. In a Roman Catholic country, at least in Belgium, the friars have full liberty to translate their evangelical ideas into active life. I had heard that the Belgian province was a perfect model of monastic life, and, as I had vague dreams of helping F. David in his slowly maturing plan to reform our English houses, I desired to study it attentively.

I soon learned that perfection consisted, in their view, very largely of a mechanical and lifeless discipline. Much stress was laid on the exact observance of the letter of the constitutions, which we English friars greatly neglected. In most of the monasteries the friars arose at midnight for Office, rigorously observed all the fasts, would not touch a sou with a shovel, never laid aside their religious habit, and never interfered in secular business. They felt themselves, therefore, at a sufficient altitude to look down compassionately on our English province, and they were sincerely astonished when a general of the order, the shrewd and gifted F. Bernardine, quite failed to appreciate their excellent condition on the occasion of a visit from Rome. In point of fact, the province is infected with the idle, intriguing, and materialistic spirit which is too notoriously associated with monasticism when it is not under the constant pressure and supervision of heretics and unbelievers.

Their literal fulfilment of the vow of poverty in these unsympathetic times leads to curious complications. In the primitive innocence of the order (its first ten years) the vow of poverty implied that all the houses, clothing, &c., that were given to the friars remained the property of the donors; that money was on no account to be received for their labours; and that all food was to be begged in kind. In the course of time the paternal solicitude of the Pope helped them out of difficulties by declaring that whatever was given to the friars became his—the Pope's—property. He also instructed them to appoint a layman as syndic to each of the monasteries, who should undertake (in the Pope's name, not that of the friars) the financial and legal matters which the letter of the rule forbade the friars to undertake; gradually, too, brothers of the third order, who make no vow of poverty, were introduced into the friaries as servants, and a superior could thus always have a treasurer at hand.

In England the friars never troubled either syndic or lay-brother. Once a quarter the syndic, or "papa," was invited to the friary to sign the books, but the friars were careful to choose some religious-minded man whose trust was larger than his curiosity. I remember the consternation that once fell on the Manchester friary, which was far from ascetic, when the syndic they had indiscreetly chosen asked that the books might be sent to him to study before he signed. The bill for spirits would have surprised him, if he had insisted on seeing the accounts. The superior of each of our English monasteries had his safe and his bank account, no priest ever went out with an empty pocket, and the authorities made contracts (from which the Pope's name is wisely excluded) and went to law like every other modern Christian. In Belgium the scheme of holy poverty as modified by the Popes (which would have pained Francis of Assisi) is followed out faithfully. All food is sent in in kind by the surrounding peasantry except, usually, meat and beer, which are bought through the syndic. A lay-brother is constantly wandering about the country begging provisions for the friars, and the response is generous both in quantity and quality. The brown habit is sure to elicit sympathy, especially in the form of liquid, and even the railway officials accept a note from the friary when a ticket is necessary. I have travelled all over Belgium, visiting Brussels, Waterloo, &c., as comfortably as a tourist, without touching a centime from one end of the year to the other.

Their monasteries, too, bear the visible stamp of their voluntary poverty. Linen is never seen in them, on tables (except on high festivals), on beds, or on the persons of the friars; and another point on which they imitate the apostle St. James is that they rigorously deny themselves the luxury of a bath—for the reason, apparently, that was given by the French nun to the English girl who asked why she was not allowed to take a bath at the pensionnat: “Le bon Dieu vous verrait!” Gas is not admitted; and, worst of all, they think it incumbent on them to reproduce in their friaries the primitive sanitary arrangements of the neighbouring cottages. Our lavatory, too, was fitted up with archaic severity. A dirty battered zinc trough ran along under a row of carefully assorted taps, and into these the water had to be pumped every three minutes. There were no hand-basins, there was no hot water, and neither comb nor brush; and only a tub of black soft soap was provided for our ablutions. Some of the friars made use, in the absence of basins, of vessels which must be left to the reader's imagination. I have seen this done, from force of habit, even in England.

The fasts were rigorously observed; though, as it is a widespread custom both in France and Belgium not to breakfast before midday, the friars suffered little inconvenience by this. At the same time the feasts were celebrated with a proportionate zeal. On an ordinary feast-day, which occurs once or twice every month, the friars would sit for three hours or more, sipping their wine, talking, chaffing, quarrelling, long after the dinner had disappeared. Extraordinary feasts would be celebrated with the enthusiasm of schoolboys. There would be banquets of a most sumptuous character, with linen tablecloths, flowers, and myriads of glasses; wine in abundance and of excellent quality; music, instrumental and vocal; dramatic, humorous, and character sketches. In the larger convents, where there are about thirty priests and forty or fifty students, there was plenty of musical talent, and concerts would sometimes be prepared for weeks in advance in honour of a jubilee or similar festival; and every priest had his circle of "quasels"—pious admirers and penitents of the gentler sex—who undertook the culinary honours of his festival.

The quantity of beer and claret which they consume is enormous, yet I saw no excesses in that direction; their capacity, however, is astonishing, and there are few of them who do not kindle at the prospect of an extra pint of beer or of a bottle of red wine. The youngest novices take three pints of beer per day, for they take no tea in the afternoon, and they soon learn to look out for every opportunity of an extra pint. Spirits are forbidden, though a few of the elders who have been on the English mission have developed a taste for whisky. They tell a curious story in connection with it in one of their monasteries. An English visitor had smuggled over a bottle for a lay-brother whom he had known in former years. Later in the afternoon the lay-brother and one of his comrades were missing from Vespers. After a long search they were at length discovered in one of the workshops in a profound slumber, with the half-empty bottle and all the materials of punch on a table beside them. At Louvain the friars had been forced to build a special entrance to the monastery for the introduction of their beer, as a censorious Liberal lived opposite the great gate, and kept a malicious account of the barrels imported. One of the most anxious concerns of a superior is his wine-cellar, for he knows well that his chance of re-election is closely connected with it. On one occasion, when I had asked why a certain young friar seemed to be a popular candidate for the highest position before an election, I was told with a smile that "his brother was a wine merchant." Wherever I went in Belgium, to monasteries, nunneries, or private houses, I found that tectotalism was regarded as a disease whose characteristic microbe was indigenous to the British Isles.

The first unfavourable impression I made upon my hosts was by my unintelligible refusal to drink. We arrived at Ghent for dinner, and after dinner (with the usual pint of strong ale) four of us sat down to five or six bottles of good claret. I drew the line at the sixth glass, and at once attracted as much suspicion as a "water-bibber" of ancient Greece or Rome. At three o'clock a second pint of strong ale had to be faced, and at seven a third; when wine re-appeared after that I violently protested, and I never recovered their good opinion. Thirst seems to be a national affliction, for even the peasant women sometimes have drinking matches (of coffee) at their village fairs, and the first or second prize has more than once fallen a victim to her caffeine intemperance. It is interesting to note that few of the friars preserve any mental vigour up to their sixtieth year, and that great numbers fall victims to apoplexy.

There are no congregations attached to the friaries, so that their work differs materially from that of English priests. In fact, their life is the typical monastic life, for, as has been explained, canon law prescribes that monastic houses should only be considered as auxiliaries of the regular clergy. The first result, however, is usually a conflict with the priest in whose parish the monks establish themselves, as they attract his parishioners to their services; and they rarely find much favour with the bishop of the diocese. They hear great numbers of confessions, principally of the surrounding peasantry, and have frequent ceremonies in their churches, but, as there are usually so many friars, the work occupies little time. The only work of importance which they do is to preach special sermons and give missions in distant parishes, but even that is little in proportion to their vast numbers. One meets amongst them many earnest and devout men who are never idle for a moment, but the majority lead the most dull and inactive and useless lives.

At Louvain there were nine priests and hardly sufficient work to occupy the time of four. There was one earnest exemplary friar, who was constantly and usefully occupied; another, equally earnest, would exhaust himself one fortnight and recuperate the next; the remainder led a life of most unenviable inaction. Some, under one pretext or another, did absolutely nothing from one end of the week to the other. They were no students; in fact, most of them were grossly ignorant, and their large library was practically unused. In summer they would lounge in the garden or bask at the windows of their cells until the bell rang out the next signal for some vapid religious exercise; in winter they would crowd round their stove, and discuss the daily paper or some point of ritual or casuistry, eager as children for the most trivial distraction.

In fact, between idleness and eccentricity, many of them had developed most extraordinary manias. One of our priests, a venerable old friar whose only sacerdotal duties consisted in blessing babies and giving the peasants recipes (prayers) for diseased cattle, had succeeded in getting himself appointed as assistant cook. His gluttony was the standard joke of the community; his meals were prodigious. Another friar devoted his time to the solution of the problem of perpetual motion; another had designed a cycle which was to outrun any in the market, if he could devise a brake capable of stopping it when in motion ; another explained to me a system of the universe which he had constructed (from certain texts of Genesis) to the utter and final overthrow of materialism. He had explained it to several professors of science, who had admitted its force in silence, and I found myself in the same predicament. Some took to mending clocks, of which they had a number in their cells, others to painting, others to gardening, others to making collections of little pictures of the Virgin or St. Joseph, or of miraculous statues. Few of them spent any large proportion of their time in what even a Catholic would consider the service of humanity.

The little knowledge they possessed was usually confined to liturgy and casuistry. Not being parish priests they had not the advantage of daily visits amongst the laity, which is the only refining influence and almost the only stimulus to education of a celibate clergy ; and the little preaching and ministerial work they were entrusted with, lying almost exclusively amongst the poor, did not demand any serious thought or study. There are always a few ripe scholars amongst them—very few at the present time—but the majority profess to base their undisguised aversion for study on the letter and spirit of their constitutions ; and not without reason, though they forget that the age to which that rule was adapted has passed for ever. There is no pressure upon them, yet their ordinary studies make little impression on them, and, though the Catholic university opens its halls gratis to them, they only reluctantly allow one or two of their students to enter it each year. To graduate they regard as an unpardonable conceit for a monk, and I was therefore not permitted to take the degree of Ph.D. to which my studies entitled me.

Their complete ignorance of philosophy led them to take a superfluous interest in my welfare, and gave me a small idea of the way in which Roger Bacons are victimised. Mgr. Mercier had sent me Paul Janet's "Causes Finales" to read, and whilst I was doing so one of the elder friars came to glance at the title of my book. He considered it for some moments in perplexity, and at length exclaimed: "Tiens! la cause finale, c'est la mort!" I offered no correction, and he went to acquaint the others, as usual. Then one of the younger friars, the scholar of the community, recollected that he had read somewhere that Janet was "chef de l'école spiritualiste" in France, and, nobody knowing the difference between spiritism and spiritualism, it was agreed that I was exploring the questionable region of spooks. When Mgr. Mercier went on to lend me the works of Schopenhauer (and they had looked up the name in the encyclopædia) there was serious question of breaking off my intercourse with him and writing to England of my suspected tendencies. Happily, I was in a position to treat them with indifference, for I was neither their subject nor their guest. They were paid (by my mass fees) for my maintenance—which cost them nothing—and even my books, clothing, bedding, &c., had to be paid for from England. Englishmen, in their eyes, are proverbially proud; I was credited with an inordinate share of that British virtue.

At present they are making strenuous efforts to re-organise and improve their scheme of study. One or two earnest men are striving to lift the burden which is oppressing them, and possibly time will bring an improvement; though it can only be by a sacrifice in point of numbers which all are unwilling to make. The two points in which the glory of the fraternity is thought to consist are the maintenance of a perfect formal discipline and the increase of members. The Belgian friars are wrongly endeavouring to secure both points at once. They have built recently a large preparatory college, which is always crowded with aspirants. But when I asked one of the Belgian friars, in an unguarded moment, whence the aspirants came, he answered with a shrug of his shoulders: "They have swept up the rubbish of the streets"; and another explained that their training was deeply vitiated by espionnage and by an injudicious system of rewards and punishments. Whatever may be their future—and so long as Socialism is kept in check they have every favourable condition—it is quite clear that any serious attempt to purify, to vitalise and spiritualise their fraternity, will meet bitter opposition, and will, if successful, considerably reduce their numbers. No large body of men will ever again sincerely adopt an ascetical spirit in their common life. And the Belgian fraternity will be healthier and happier for the remainder of its days if it can rid itself of all its malades imaginaires, lazy pietists, crass sensualists, and ambitious office-seekers.

Belgium is claimed as a Roman Catholic country, and it may be interesting to discuss the extent and nature of its fidelity to Rome in the light of my inquiries and observations. I had many and intimate opportunities for studying it, and I availed myself of them carefully; not only because I took a speculative interest in the question, but on account of the disparaging references that the friars made repeatedly to my own heretical country—"your unhappy country" was their usual description of England. When I noticed in the list of Peter's-pence offerings that Belgium had collected for his Holiness only 200,000 lire, and England 1,200,000, I felt there was occasion for careful inquiry.

Politics and religion are so confused in Belgium that the religious status of the country has been roughly indicated at every election. For many years there has been a fierce struggle between Liberalism and Catholicism, in which the orthodox party has been frequently overpowered; and Liberalism, as is well known, is the anti-clerical, free-thought party. It is, roughly speaking, the bourgeoisie of Belgium (with a sprinkling of the higher and of the industrial class), permeated with Voltaireanism and modern rationalism: its motto was Gambetta's "Le cléricalisme, voilà l'ennemi," or as the Belgian mob puts it more forcibly "À bas la calotte!" Not that it was at all a philosophical sect; it was purely active, but accepted the conclusions of the philosophers and the critics as honestly as the orthodox clung to the conclusions of the theologian. In any case it was bitterly opposed to the established religion and the dominion of the clergy on every issue. The aristocracy, for obvious reasons, indolently sided with the Church; the peasantry, on the whole, remained faithful out of brute stolidity and imperviousness to argument.

But during the last few years there has been a profound change in the field as Socialism gained power and character. Not very many years ago a young advocate at the Brussels Catholic conference declared himself a Christian socialist, and was emphatically suppressed by the clerical and aristocratic members; now, if it were not for Christian Socialism, Rome would soon lose its hold of the peasantry. Socialism, avowedly anti-Christian as it is on the Continent, has secured the industrial classes and is undoubtedly making progress amongst the peasantry. However, it cannot join forces with waning Liberalism, for it hates and is hated by the bourgeoisie; and it has had the effect of arousing the monarchy and aristocracy to some sense of their danger. Thus the power of the Church remains as yet slightly in the ascendant: it can command a little more than half the votes of the country as long as the present partial suffrage holds. The results, however, show that Catholics are really in the minority, and if ever the Socialists and Liberals unite they will be swept out of power.

So much is clear from election results; but in a country that is fermenting with new ideas mere statistics teach very little of themselves. A new party, which is hardly a generation old, and which has had a marvellously rapid growth, is presumed to have acquired a serious momentum. It consists almost entirely of converts, and the convert is usually conscious of his opinions and zealous for them. The adherents of the old party may still be, to a great extent, in their traditional apathy, and only need their minds to be quickened to make them change their position. Such would seem to be the state of affairs in Belgium, if we take no more than clerical witnesses.

It is much easier to test the real fidelity of nominal adherents of the Church of Rome than of those of any other sect or party in existence; it is the only sect that binds its members under pain of grievous sin to certain positive religious observances. Hence it is possible to gauge the depth and vitality of its influence over its statistical members without entering into their consciences. And so the fact that one-third of the students at the only Catholic university habitually neglect mass has a great significance. I once heard a dispute between a Walloon Premonstratensian monk and a Flemish Franciscan about the religious merits of their respective races. To a stranger it seemed difficult to choose between them. Confession was taken as a safe test, for annual confession is essential, and its integrity is equally demanded under pain of mortal sin. However, the Walloon boasted that you could believe a Walloon in the confessional, but certainly not a Fleming. The Fleming admitted that it was true, but he added, "You can believe a Walloon when you get him, but he only comes to confess twice in his life, at his first communion and at death." They were both old missionaries, and their points were quite confirmed by the others present.

Moreover, I had a more intimate experience of the country, which confirmed my low estimate of its Catholicism. During the Easter vacation I went to a small convent in the country, about ten miles south of Brussels. The superior of the convent obtained jurisdiction for me, and I did much service in the chapel of the Comtesse de Meeus, in our own great solid iron church at Argenteuil (well known to Waterloo visitors), and in the parish church at Ohain. We monks were forbidden under pain of suspension to assist the dying or to hear Easter confessions; but I soon found that if we did not do so a great many people would refuse to take the sacraments. I assisted three dying persons: one was already unconscious and could only be anointed, and her friends were utterly indifferent about even that; another, a young man, had to be coaxed into making his confession, but refused point blank to receive communion and extreme unction from his parish priest, and died without them; the third visibly condescended to confess, saying that it was immaterial to him—he would if I wished. Many others came to confess, saying that they would either confess to me or not at all. Everywhere, even amongst professing Catholics, there was a strong anti-clerical feeling, though the peasantry made a curious exception in favour of monks. They had not the least idea of the real life inside the friaries and the quantity of liquor consumed.

And when I went down to assist at Ohain for the last day of the Easter confessions I found the little parish in a curious condition, even to my heretical experience. The curé smiled when I asked how many he expected for confession, and said that he had not the faintest idea. Theoretically, he should have known how many had already made their Pâques (or Easter confession), and how many parishioners he had; it was a simple sum of subtraction. He was amused at my simplicity. It appeared that there were some hundreds who might or might not make their Pâques: in point of fact, we had about a hundred more than the preceding year. He did not seem much concerned about the matter; said it was not an abnormal condition, and that it seemed irremediable. It was curious to note that a Protestant mission which had been founded in the neighbourhood for some time had only succeeded after heroic efforts in securing two dilapidated "converts." The Belgians, like the French, are Catholic or nothing.

What I observed was fully confirmed by the information I sought on the subject. The people were indifferent, and even a large proportion of the clergy were apathetic. Great Catholic demonstrations there were in abundance, but little importance can be attached to such manifestations. In the great procession of the Fête-Dieu at Louvain I saw hundreds taking part who were merely nominal Catholics; and other extraordinary religious displays, such as the procession of the miraculous statue at Hasselt, where I spent some time, were largely supported by the Liberal municipality and hotel-keepers from commercial reasons. Little can be gathered, therefore, from statistics or from external pageantry. The fidelity of the people must be tested, as in France, by their obedience to the grave obligations the Church imposes. Under such a test the Catholicism of Belgium fails lamentably. Although the wisdom of uniting religious and political issues may be questioned, one may confidently anticipate a steady growth of the anti-clerical party.

CHAPTER VIII

MINISTRY IN LONDON

FROM Louvain I was recalled at the close of the first academical year by a revival of my educational functions at London. A new generation of philosophers had arrived, and I had to resume the task of imprinting the conclusions of the scholastic philosophy on their youthful and unsympathetic minds. The theological studies also were conducted at Forest Gate, and all the students had to remain under an "instructor" until they were promoted to the priesthood. As I held that position during most of the time I remained at Forest Gate, I had ample opportunity to study the formation of priests, as the instructor is responsible for the material and spiritual welfare of those under his charge. Of the innumerable complications with superiors, and with a certain type of inferiors, which my zeal (not always, perhaps, nicely tempered with prudence) provoked I forbear to speak. Enough has been said in the preceding chapters about the life of the students, so I pass on to a fuller treatment of the sacerdotal ministry, in which I was now thoroughly immersed.

In a monastic house, even in England, there are always more priests than in a secular presbytery; more, indeed, than are necessary for the administration of the parish which is committed to their care. Many of these priests, however, are travelling missionaries whose work lies almost entirely outside their convent. It is customary in Catholic churches to hold a mission, or series of services somewhat akin to the revival services of the Methodists, every few years; it consists principally of a course of the most violent and imaginative sermons on hell, heaven, eternity, &c., and really has the effect of converting numbers to a sense of their religious duties. Although Cardinal Manning, who, in writing and in action, shows a studied disregard of the monastic orders, endeavoured to form a band of secular or non-monastic missionaries, it is usually conceded that the desired effect can only be satisfactorily attained by monks. Hence every order has a number of religious specially trained for that purpose, of whom two or three are found in every monastery.

Their life differs entirely from that of the ordinary monk; even when they are at home they are exempt from community services, from which the constitutions release them for three days after returning from and three days before starting for a mission. They frequently travel long distances, especially to Ireland, and are sometimes absent from their monastery for months at a time. They are, as has been said, the chief bread-winners of the community. They receive from five to ten pounds per week for their services, and bring home also large sums in the shape of alms or mass-stipends; if a smaller fee is offered they never return to that parish. I have known a Franciscan superior (whose rule forbids him to claim any fee whatever, or to receive any money) to maintain a warm correspondence with a parish priest on the insufficiency of his fee. “Tempora mutantur, nos et mutamur in illis” would not be an inappropriate motto for the friars to substitute for their high-sounding “In sanctitate et doctrina.” However, the missionaries have very severe labours, as a rule, and many of them work with untiring industry and devotion. They hold a service every evening, including one heavy sermon, an instruction, and a number of fatiguing ceremonies. I have known many priests to collapse under the strain. The enormous number of confessions they hear adds much to their exertions. At the same time, many of them prefer the change and comparative comfort of the life to confinement in the monastery. They lighten their task by preaching the same sermons everywhere they go, and they usually find the presbytery much more comfortable than home; if they do not, the parish priest will ask in vain for a second mission.

Another form of outside work which is less understood is the practice of giving “retreats” to monasteries, nunneries, and other religious establishments. A retreat is a period of recollection in which the inmates of a convent suspend all study and secular occupation, and occupy themselves exclusively with religious exercises; it usually lasts from ten to fourteen days, and is held annually. The day is spent in profound silence and meditation, but there are a number of common ceremonies, and two or three “meditations”—a kind of familiar sermon or causerie—are preached daily. The amiable Jesuits are much in demand for retreats, especially by the equally amiable congregations of teaching nuns, but our friars were entrusted with a large number every year amongst the less aristocratic congregations of nuns. To give a retreat is, after a slight experience, not at all a disagreeable task, and many even of our professors used to spend their vacation in preaching them. The usual method is to write out a set of meditations (the usual graphic descriptions of the "last day," heaven, hell, &c.), though abler men, or men of sincere fervour, make no preparation. The same set of meditations is, of course, used in different places, and five or six sets suffice for a lifetime; for a priest is often invited several years in succession to the same convent, and, if the nuns have been particularly amiable and hospitable, he accepts. In such cases he must have a new set of conferences, for nuns have long memories, and will look up maliciously if he drops into a passage of one of his former sermons. Besides receiving the usual five or ten pounds, the priest can always count upon a warm welcome and tender and graceful hospitality from the good sisters during his residence in their convent; and, as the convent is very frequently at a pleasant watering-place or other desirable locality, it is not surprising that the work is much appreciated.

Then there are minor functions which bring grist to the conventual mill, and afford the friars some diversion from the dreary monotony of home life. The secular clergy take annual holidays, and engage a friar at one pound per Sunday to conduct their services; one of our friaries (at Manchester), where the missionaries were not in great demand for higher work, took up the work of "supply" with such zeal that it earned the title of the "Seraphic Cab-stand."

Special sermons, also, are frequently asked, and chaplaincies are sometimes offered to the friars. A neighbouring nunnery will always demand their services, and even country families may prefer to bring a friar down every Sunday for a couple of guineas than to have a chaplain haunting the premises all the week.

With so many outward attractions of a lucrative and congenial nature the friars are sometimes tempted to neglect their own parish, which is, or should be, their principal care. The superior of the monastery is always rector or parish priest,¹ and several of his inferiors act as curates; as a rule there is about one priest to every thousand people, less in older and larger parishes—at Glasgow we had six priests to attend to 16,000 people—and more in growing congregations. The work, however, is usually confined to the week end. On Saturday confessions are heard, for it is necessary to confess before approaching the sacrament, which is usually received on Sunday morning. On Sunday the priest has a long and very fatiguing day's work; he must, as a rule, say two masses, an early one for communicants and a late sung mass, at which also he preaches. On account of the obligation to remain fasting, so stern that not even a drop of water must pass his lips until the end of the last mass, the work is very exacting, especially to a priest who is single-handed. The section of theology which treats of this peculiar fast is interesting; the careful calculation what fraction of a teaspoonful of water, or what substances (whether flies, cork, glass, silk, cotton, &c.) break the fast, affords serious pre-occupation to the casuist. In the afternoon there are numerous minor ceremonies, baptisms, catechetical instructions, &c.; and in the evening another long sermon with Vespers and Benediction. Speaking from experience I may say that for one man it is as severe a day's work as can be found in any profession.

Here, however, the monastic clergy have the advantage of numbers. Even the ordinary priest has the consolation that the other six days of the week will be practically days of rest; but to monks the Sunday itself is not very formidable. Of the six friars in our community there were never less than three at home on Sunday, so that the work was fairly distributed.

However, the Sunday work of the priest is obvious enough. Curiosity looks rather to the manner in which he spends the other six days of the week. It may be said in a word that the daily life of a clergyman is much the same in every religious sect. Apart from the fact that he has no family relations, the Catholic priest occupies himself in a manner very similar to that of his Anglican brother. The friar, of course, is supposed to follow a very different and much more serious "order of the day," but here again theory and practice lie wide apart. The rule of the friar, who, in a missionary country like England or the States, is unfortunately compelled to take charge of a parish, is simple and reasonable; he must assist at the community devotions which have been previously described, and the remainder of his time must be divided between study and the discharge of his parochial duties. In the morning from eight to twelve he is supposed to study, from three to seven he must visit his parishioners, from eight to ten he must occupy himself once more with study or prayer.

That is the edifying theory, but the fact is that the more agreeable task of attending to their parishioners absorbs most of the priests' time. There are few friars who, after they have once entered upon parochial duties, give more than a sporadic and careless attention to study. They say that they do not find any advantage for the better performance of their duties in study, and, since most of their "duty" resolves itself into visits to the sick and chattering with ladies over afternoon tea, their contention is plausible enough; although there are many cases in which their unfamiliarity with modern literature and its great problems brings them into contempt. I have been asked by wives or sisters in the confessional to visit men who were understood to be wavering in faith. When I referred them to their parish priests, I was answered that they had so low an estimate of their parish priests that they refused to discuss with them. And where they do meet a Catholic who shows an interest in and acquaintance with modern literature, the clergy are suspiciously prompt to urge the restrictions imposed by the Index. If they are not prepared to acquaint themselves with current literature—and a not unintelligent colleague of mine once frankly admitted that he could not read even the pellucid essays of Mr. Huxley—they take care that their flock does not outstrip them. I once heard a professor of dogmatic theology contend that the Nineteenth Century is on the Index, and should be forbidden to Catholics; yet so curious is the procedure of the Church, that it was reserved for a Catholic writer (Mivart) to procure for it, by his contributions, a place in the distinguished gallery of the condemned. At any rate, a priest who is not inclined to study finds in the elasticity of the Church's policy ample justification for literary tyranny.

The manner in which the clergy exercise their literary responsibility tries the patience of the educated layman. The priest, and especially the friar, has very little acquaintance with fiction (which is expressly proscribed by the monastic constitutions), still less with science or philosophy, and has very wrong ideas of history; and, since the majority of condemned books are not named in the Index, but are simply involved in the general censure of "against faith or morals," he has to exercise his judgment on a point of some delicacy. The result is sad confusion. One priest is delighted with "The Three Musketeers," and permits Dumas—unconscious that Dumas is expressly on the Index. Ouida is much disputed, even amongst the Jesuits. The high-principled works of George Eliot are condemned unread; she was an agnostic, and lived with Lewes. Mrs. Lynn Linton, Mrs. Humphry Ward, Sarah Grand, Marie Corelli, George Meredith, Thomas Hardy, Hall Caine, Eden Phillpotts, Jerome K. Jerome, Anthony Hope, H. G. Wells, and most of our leading novelists are either deists or agnostics. Even Mrs. Craigie and Dr. Barry give anxiety at times. The poor Catholic is perplexed before the list of modern novelists, and so reads them all. So it is with science and philosophy. The best English and German exponents are heterodox, and when the priest pays his visit and sees their works lying about, he not infrequently demands that they be destroyed. Hence it is that Jesuit and other "Catholic Truth Society" writers find it possible to foist on the Catholic body the lamentable garbling of history and science which one finds in their publications. Their readers are forbidden to read the other side, and Catholic reviews of antagonistic literature are quite unscrupulous, at least in such journals as the Catholic Times.

The priest's conversation is rendered insipid and uninviting by the same dearth of knowledge and narrowness of judgment. On biblical criticism, sociology, and a host of prominent questions, the priest is either painfully dogmatic on points that the educated world has long ceased to dogmatise about, or else he is just as painfully confused. But even on a number of questions on which the world has formed a decided opinion years ago, he is strangely timid and conservative. Rome itself showed much caution in responding to an inquiry about hypnotic phenomena, and such eminent modern theologians as Lehmkühl and Ballerini seem convinced that in its more abstruse phenomena hypnotism embodies a diabolical influence. Even table-turning, of which Carpenter gave a lucid explanation ages ago, is gravely called in question by the Roman decrees and the casuists, and, naturally, by the majority. In fact, the author whom I was directed to use in teaching philosophy, Mgr. E. Grand-claude, a widely popular modern author, gravely attributes the more curious manifestations of somnambulism to the same untiring and ubiquitous agent. On almost every question the priest is found to be ignorant, antiquated, tyrannical.

Naturally, then, the conversations with their parishioners, which occupy most of their time, are not of an intellectual type. In the morning the friar rarely visits, except in cases of sickness, but he is much visited. In every monastery there is a section marked off near the door—usually the hall and a few small parlours—to which ladies are allowed access. Into the monastery proper women (except the queen, who cannot be excluded) are never admitted under any circumstances, even to visit a dying son or brother, under pain of excommunication. I have known a mother to sit in tears in the waiting-room while her son, a young priest, was dying in the infirmary almost above her head. In these parlours, however (which, I hasten to add, are fitted with glass doors), the friars spend a good part of the morning. The rest of the forenoon is supposed to be spent in reading or preparing sermons in the cells; but it goes very largely in chatting in each other's cells, or in the library, or over the daily paper—all of which is entirely illicit. After dinner, recreation, and early tea, the friars exchange their brown habits for ordinary clerical attire and proceed to visit their parishioners. They are directed to return to the convent at seven, but they usually arrive much later.

Apart from the care of the sick and the dying, and the occasional necessity of reproving wandering sheep, the duty of "visiting," which is almost their only function on the six appointed days of labour, is far from laborious. The parish is divided into districts, of which one is committed to the care of each priest, and he is directed to visit each family once in three months. The object is, of course, to strengthen the bond between clergy and laity and to secure individual fidelity to the Church. Naturally, however, what really happens is that a few agreeable families are selected for frequent visits, which differ in no respect from the visits of ordinary unconsecrated people (in fact, the priest would hardly be welcome who paraded his profession too much); sometimes they are unusually generous benefactors, sometimes merely families of ordinary social attractiveness, very frequently merely young and amiable ladies whose husbands or fathers are at business. In any case, the poor and uninteresting are forgotten; the favourites are visited weekly or oftener, and the visits are sometimes protracted to two or three hours. Much jealousy ensues amongst the favourites (who watch each other's houses), and counter visits, teas, dinners, parties, &c., have to be accepted. Thus the week is easily and not uncongenially absorbed, and a priest often finds that he is scarcely able to prepare a sermon for the Sunday.

Since most of the visits are made in the afternoon and on week days, it follows that they are almost exclusively made to ladies; one result of which is that our English friars are found to be much less misogynous than their continental or their medieval brethren, who have or had no parishes to superintend. Many Protestant husbands forbid the admission of a priest into the house in their absence. On the whole, the priests are discreet, and an excellent control is exercised over all concerned by a comprehensive system of jealousy. The priests are jealous of each other, and strongly resent any intrusion in each other's district or parish; the ladies honoured with the visits are jealous of each other; and a numerous non-Catholic population is jealously surveying the whole. In the Franciscan rule there is, besides the vow of chastity, a special grave precept enjoining the friars to avoid "suspicious intercourse" with women, and it is not uncommon for a superior publicly to denounce an inferior for that fault. Two or three cases happened at Forest Gate in my time, but the accusation clearly sprang from jealousy on the part of the superior. In private, mutual accusation, especially of frequenting by preference the society of young women, was very common, and was not without foundation. Another rule that tended to prevent disorder was that all letters were to be given open to the superior to be forwarded, and he was supposed to read all the letters he received for his inferiors. But the superior who followed out this rule in dealing with the correspondence of any but the juniors would have an unenviable position; and, of course, the priests were out every day themselves and could easily post their letters.

There was also a regulation—the only one in our constitutions (which, unlike "the rule" written by St. Francis, the friar does not solemnly vow to observe, and which are only disciplinary) that was enforced under a grave moral obligation—forbidding us to take any intoxicating drink within the limits of our own parish. The rule, which merely aimed at preventing scandal, led to curious incidents and many transgressions. One old Belgian friar, who was afflicted with chronic thirst and did not find the monastic allowance sufficient, used to take the tram regularly to some hotel just outside the limits of the parish (at Stratford in East London). A dispensation could only be obtained by calling together the elders of the community and asking their collective permission. They were, of course, always willing to oblige each other and, to do them justice, even the juniors. In my later monastic days, when faith waned, I appreciated the arrangement. There were friars, however, who drank where they willed and ignored the rule. Like all other rules, it was susceptible of many ingenious interpretations, and, finally, the opinion was started that the whole of the constitutions were invalid.

The mutual intercourse of the friars was limited, in theory, to the hour's recreation after dinner. Wine was only granted by the constitutions about once per month, and whisky was entirely prohibited. In point of fact, there were friaries (Manchester, for instance) in which whisky was given almost every day, and sometimes three times per day. In most friaries it was given every Saturday and Sunday evening. At Forest Gate, partly from greater sobriety, partly (and very much) from greater poverty, and partly on account of the presence of students, we only drank wine or spirits three or four times per week; whisky was discountenanced, but one friar found port to injure his tonsils, another complained of liver, another of heart, &c., so that it was the favourite drink. Smoking also was prohibited in the monastery; but it was not difficult to obtain a medical recommendation to smoke, and the local superior could always distribute cigars when he willed.

The nature of the recreation has been mentioned in a previous chapter. We sat and talked over our coffee for half-an-hour, then discoursed in the garden for half-an-hour. In some monasteries dominoes, bagatelle, skittles, &c., were introduced to escape the necessity for conversation. Cards were forbidden, and chess was discountenanced (with complete success) on the ambiguous ground that the friars had no cerebral tissue to waste on intellectual games.¹

The conversation only deserves a word on account of the curiosity which seems to prevail with regard to it. Two types of monastic conversation are known to the general public: the spiritual talk recommended by monastic writers and the jolly intercourse so dear to the artist. Both types, and especially the former, are infrequent in the real life of the friary. Mr. Dendy Sadler's pictures of jolly friars may serve to illustrate their high festivals, but the ordinary conversation was dull and depressing. Politics had the largest share in it. All the friars were keen politicians, though they dare not openly manifest any political sympathy. They were all Liberals, but for the sake of argument one or other would attack or defend some point in an uninteresting way for an hour or so. One daily paper is allowed in the friary, but no weeklies or monthlies. Then casuistry gave much matter for discussion, and points of ritual and canon law were often debated. Here and there some friar of a higher intellectual type might broach questions of living interest, but in those cases the conversation was apt to degenerate into a pedantic and not very accurate monologue. But a vast amount of time was spent, as has frequently been suggested of them, in the most painful puerilities. Their sense of humour seems to undergo an extraordinary degeneration, and the more rational of them frequently express their disgust at the character of their "recreation." There are one or two strong personalities who habitually tyrannise over the friaries in which they are found, and even contrive at the elections to keep near them one or two less gifted brethren whom they may bully and banter at will. As they are men of high authority and influence, their victims find it expedient to submit patiently to this constant flight of rudely fashioned shafts for a year or two; in the end they usually find themselves elevated to some position to which their intrinsic merit could hardly have raised them.

For throughout the length and breadth of the Franciscan Order (and every other order) ambition and intrigue of office are the most effectual hindrances to fraternal charity. All officials are elected and frequently changed, so that the little province is as saturated with jealousy and intrigue as a South American Republic. Every three years a general election is held, at which the General from Rome is supposed to preside. The usual course is for the General (whose real name is "general servant" of the fraternity, but it is usually preferred in the abbreviated form) to send a deputy to the province which is about to hold its elections. The deputy, or "visitator," visits all the monasteries in succession and affords each friar an opportunity, in private conversation, to submit his personal grievances or his knowledge of general abuses. Of the former, however, the visitor takes little notice, referring them to more immediate superiors, and he is usually quite powerless to correct any general abuse. One of our English friars was deputed to visit the Irish province on the occasion of its election some years before my secession. He did not disguise his intention of making a special effort to check the flow of whisky in that province, as he considered it the source of all evil in modern monastic life; his own particular vanity was port. We were not a little surprised to find on the return of our zealous crusader that he had himself been converted to the seductive spirit, and only the too openly manifested delight of his numerous enemies—whom he had persistently denounced at Rome for ten years as “whisky-drinkers”—prevailed upon him to return to port.

When the visitor has completed the circuit of the province he summons the members of the higher council, or “definitors,” to the monastery where the election is held. The superiors or “guardians” of the various monasteries then send in their resignations, together with a declaration on oath by their priests (if they can get all the signatures), that they have fulfilled their duty to their community and a full account of their financial transactions. The guardians themselves arrive on the following day, and proceed by a secret ballot to the election of a new provincial, and his council of five definitors. The guardians then disperse, and the newly elected council proceeds to appoint new guardians with their subordinate officers. Everything is conducted with the utmost secrecy, the voting papers being burned and pulverised in the presence of the voters, and every friar present being put under oath not to reveal the proceedings. Public prayers are also commanded for weeks in advance, and the election opens with a solemn High Mass to the Holy Spirit; an oath is also taken by the electors that they will choose those whom they consider the most worthy.

That is the admirable theory of the election; its actual course is somewhat different. Before the solemn imploration of the light of the Holy Spirit on the election morning the whole scheme has been practically settled. The province is really an oligarchy, not an elective democracy. A few abler or older men form the Definitorium, and there is a sufficiently clear understanding¹ between them and the guardians to insure that the guardians will re-elect them and they, in their turn, will reappoint the guardians. There is a slight struggle from one or two young Radicals, and perhaps a new aspirant to a place on the council, but changes rarely occur. The old definitors are prac-

"... they are trying to force me to do what I don't think fair or just to my successor . . . but I will not do anything that I deem in principle mean or unjust to my successor. I say mean, for I deem it such when guardians to please their superiors send them gifts which the papal Bulls call bribes, and which several Popes strictly forbid. But I absolutely refused until compelled by obedience to do such. Of course I was threatened by the 'powers that be' that I would pay for it, etc.; but I told them over and over again, 'I fear only God and my conscience.'"

Unfortunately there were many who had not the firmness, honesty, and deep religious spirit of the writer of that letter. [As the writer is now dead, I will add that the letter was written by the Very Rev. Father Jarlath, O.S.F., to myself a few weeks before I left. . Second edition.] tically sure of re-election, and so on the night before the electors arrive they have arranged all appointments under no other spiritual influence than that of a cigar and a glass of whisky.

For the higher position of provincial—a quasi-episcopate—the intrigue runs much deeper. Votes are practically bought, by means of minor appointments and other bon-bons, years in advance, and the province is really severed into factions headed by the different candidates. There are many friars to whom these proceedings are very repugnant, but others use them more or less unscrupulously. I once took a prominent friar to task for his indulgent treatment of a notoriously unworthy official. He answered frankly that the man “had a vote”—going on to explain how necessary it was for the good of the fraternity that he himself should take the helm at the next election, however reluctant he felt to do so.

When these facts are considered, in addition to the jealousy which naturally arises in connection with preaching, penitents, and the esteem of the laity generally, it will be understood that life in a friary is not one of paradisaical monotony. Open conflicts are rare, but the strained relations between rivals and their followers frequently find expression in conversation and conference. In fact, the constant suspicion and caution sometimes lead to very unexpected phenomena. Thus, a colleague of mine seemed to me in uncomfortable relations with a large number of friars, and of one of them he told me a strange story. He had entered his cell during the friar’s absence and found a revolver, which he abstracted and destroyed; he even added that he kept a secret lock on his own bedroom door at night, for the ordinary lock is open to a superior's master-key, and the friar in question was a superior and a priest of high reputation.¹

Besides the triennial election, called a chapter, there is a half-chapter every eighteen months in which many changes take place. The friars do not, however, as a rule, appreciate the variety which is thus afforded them, for they soon find attachments in a mission which they are loth to break off. But quite apart from elections a friar is liable to be ordered off to a different monastery at any moment. It is related of the celebrated Duns Scotus that when he received the order to go from Paris to Cologne, he happened to be away from the Paris monastery. He at once set off on foot for Cologne without returning even to bid good-bye to his brethren. The modern friar is not so precipitate. His "obedience," as the formal order to remove is called, allows three days to reach his destination; so that the friar has ample time to collect his luggage (for in spite of his vow of poverty every friar has a certain amount of personal property), and perhaps elicit a testimonial from his pious admirers.

Needless to say, the friar no longer makes his journeys on foot, as the founder of the order intended. There is a precept in the rule that forbids "riding" under pain of mortal sin, and commentators are much at variance in their efforts to apply it to modern means of locomotion. Most of them say that the horse is still gravely prohibited—to ride, that is to say, for in Belgium we more than once had the pleasure of eating it; the ass and the camel are not to be mounted without necessity; and a ship may be used when the friar has not to pay for his sail. The railway is a subject of grave theoretical controversy, but the majority of the pundits are agreed that it may be used when necessary; which is a convenient solution. In point of fact, the English or American friar takes his cab or 'bus or train without giving a thought to his rule. He has, at least once in three years, a holiday of two or three weeks' duration, and he has odd days in the country or at the seaside. He cannot, however, leave his own country without special permission from Rome.

The "obedience," or formal order to travel, is at the same time a mark of identity for the friar when he arrives at a strange convent. He is always bound to seek the hospitality of his brethren if they have a convent in the town, and the superior's first care is to demand his "obedience," on which his destination is marked. This is enjoined as a precaution against apostates, and especially against frauds. For even monastic hospitality has been taken advantage of by impostors. In Belgium some years ago the imposition was attempted on a large scale at one of our friaries. A bishop and his secretary presented themselves for a few days' hospitality, and were received and treated by the friars with the courtesy and attention which befitted their rank. There was nothing unusual in the occurrence, and the friars were always glad to receive so flattering a guest. His lordship said mass daily with correct episcopal ceremony, and had all the requisite paraphernalia. After a time, however, a suspicion was aroused, and when his lordship had casually mentioned the name of the cardinal who had consecrated him, a telegraphic communication was made with Rome, with the result that the impostors were handed over to the civil authority. At London we had visitors from all parts of the world, and it would be difficult to detect an impostor. I remember one whom we turned out of the monastery after a few weeks' hospitality, and no one knows to this day whether he was a genuine friar or not. He was a Spaniard, an old man with our brown costume in his possession, who represented himself as a lay-brother from our province of Mexico. He hinted that a secret Government mission had brought him to London. He spoke French fluently, and was a most interesting conversationalist, representing that he had at one time been a private secretary of Don Carlos and an active figure in Spanish politics. However, Fra Carpofo's business in London seemed unduly protracted, and our suspicious superiors politely recommended him an hotel in the city.

Impostors find great difficulty in penetrating into the order as novices in modern times, for there are numerous formalities to comply with. Not only are his baptismal certificate and a letter from his bishop necessary, but inquiries are made as to whether there is any hereditary disease, or insanity, or heresy in his family, whether he is single and legitimate, and so with a host of other qualifications. In olden times anybody who presented himself was admitted to "the habit of probation" without inquiry, and it is a well-known fact that women have thus obtained entrance into the monastery and remained in it until their death. Several such women are recorded in the official Martyrology of the Order: a book in which the memory is preserved of holy friars who have not attained the supreme rank of canonisation. Their names were read to us annually.

An amusing case of imposture occurred at Forest Gate a few years before my secession. A young man of very smart appearance presented himself at the monastery and intimated a desire to enter the order as a lay-brother. He had no credentials, but mentioned casually one or two friars in other monasteries "whose masses he had served." He represented himself as a cook, saying that he had been at Charing Cross Hotel and other places. Without a single inquiry he was received into the monastery, where he remained for three weeks, cooking for the brethren and maintaining a very modest and satisfactory demeanour. On the third Sunday, however, he vanished with the whole of the money that had been collected in the church on that day, and a quantity of clothing, &c., which he had borrowed. As the Sunday was one of the great festivals, on which a special collection had been taken for the friars, the anger of the superior may be imagined. The police smiled when we gave them a description of our "novice."

CHAPTER IX

OTHER ORDERS AND THE LONDON CLERGY

IT will be readily perceived that the less attractive features of the life of the Grey Friars, which I have described, are not due to circumstances which are peculiar to that order. They are the inevitable result of forcing a mediæval ideal on temperaments and in circumstances that are entirely modern. It will be expected, therefore, that other monastic congregations, at least, will present much the same features. The rules and constitutions of different orders differ as much as their costumes, and their specific aims—for each order is supposed to have a distinctive aim to justify its separate foundation—also differ. But again, the difference is rather theoretical than practical. Through the exigencies of their missionary status in England and the United States,¹ they have been brought down to one common level of parochial activity. Their work differs little from that of the secular clergy, or the non-Catholic clergy; and the same curious and half-hearted efforts are made to maintain their ritual and ascetical peculiarities in the privacy of the convent as have been described in the case of the Grey Friars.

It was well known by my colleagues that I was deeply concerned at the unpleasant condition of my surroundings for many years before my secession. I frequently spoke with one distinguished friar on the subject, and he professed to be in entire accord with me on the point, and used to deprecate it in even stronger terms than I. However, suspecting that I would on that account be tempted to procure a release from the Franciscan rule and pass to some other order (for which permission could be obtained), he would go on to assure me—and he was a man of knowledge—that every other order, and the secular clergy too, was in a similarly unsatisfactory condition. As time went on I found many reasons to acquiesce in the opinion he gave me. Catholic priests have two weaknesses in common with the gentler sex—vanity and love of scandal. One cannot move much in clerical circles without soon learning the seamy side of different orders and dioceses. The different dioceses of the secular clergy are more or less jealous of each other, and the secular clergy are, as a rule, strongly opposed to the regulars. Nine secular priests out of ten hate all monks, and nine priests (of either kind) out of ten hate the Jesuits. One meets many priests who are willing to accept the extreme Protestant version of Jesuitism. Only a few years ago a drama was presented in a theatre at Barcelona, in which were embodied the bitterest and gravest charges against the Jesuits; and when the delighted Spaniards called for the author, a priest in his clerical dress walked to the footlights. In the presence of laymen, of course, every branch of sacerdotalism is treated as little less than angelic; a priest will then, as I have heard them do, praise a priest he hates. But a few years' attentive intercourse with different orders and with the clergy of several dioceses has taught me to regard all priests as very human, neither more nor less.

For instance, there were in my time, as was explained in the second chapter, three distinct branches of the Franciscan Order in England; and the three sections were as jealous, hostile, and mutually depreciatory as three rival missionary societies. A few years before I left the French colony of friars at Clevedon advertised for cast-off clothing for their youthful aspirants for the order; our authorities immediately wrote to Rome and got their action reproved as derogatory to the dignity of the order—the order, it will be remembered, being a mendicant order, indeed the most humble of all mendicant orders. The French friars in their turn disturbed the peace of my colleagues by securing the patronage of the Duchess of Newcastle and pitching their tent within a few miles of Forest Gate; not even inviting us to the foundation of their church. Another day our friars were exalted at the news that their Capuchin brethren (the bearded Franciscans) had been forced to sell their Dulwich monastery to the Benedictines, and again at the rumour that the Capuchins (amongst whom, it was said, there had been a general scuffle and dispersion and that several of their best men had departed for the American missions) were likely to be starved into selling their house at Olton. Both these monastic bodies had the same manner of life as ourselves, and are, indeed, now amalgamated with my late colleagues.

Other historic bodies, such as the Dominicans, Benedictines, and Carmelites, bear much the same relation to their primitive models, though their members are more cultured and refined, on the whole, than my colleagues were. The Protestant surroundings are held to prevent them from being entirely faithful to their rules, and once the thin end of the wedge is in it penetrates very deeply. The modern friars have too much sense to attempt a full revival of the thirteenth century. There is a poetry and romance about the retention of the costume, but its asceticism and crude religious realism are as antiquated as feudalism. In olden times every monastery had quite an armoury of spiked chains, bloody scourges, thigh-bracelets, hair shirts, &c. In all my experience I have only seen one such instrument of self-torture. It was a thigh-bracelet, a broad wire chain, each link ending in a sharp point that ran into the flesh. It was rusty enough, though not from the blood of victims, and it excited as much interest and humorous comment in the party of monks who were examining it as does a Spanish instrument of torture in the Tower of London in the crowd of Protestant visitors. St. Aloysius, the great model of the Jesuits, was so modest in his relations with the dangerous sex, that he did not even know his own mother by sight. To shake hands with a woman is condemned by all monastic writers as a very grave action. Most Catholic young ladies are aware that the modern monk—above all, the Jesuit—is not at all misogynous.

The Dominicans have several peculiar precepts in their rule which they are much tempted to think lightly of; they are entirely forbidden flesh-meat, and they are always forbidden to talk over dinner. I have had the pleasure of dining at their large house at Haverstock Hill on several festive occasions, and I noticed that they trim the constitution a little by adjourning to the library for dessert and wine; in fact, my estimable neighbour did keep up a sotto voce conversation with me throughout dinner. I heard a much bolder feat of another Dominican convent. Their precept directs, I understand, that flesh-meat must not enter the refectory or dining-room; the good friars, however, wearied of the daily fish, but saved their consciences on the days they took meat by dining in another room. It reminds one of the pious fraud of the Dublin Carmelites. They secured an excellent site for a church, but had to surmount an obstacle raised by a former proprietor. He, it appears, did not wish a church to be erected on the spot, so he stipulated that the land should only be sold to a person or persons agreeing to build a house thereon. That was too wide a net for a theologian; the Carmelites bought the land, erected a fine church on it, and a house on top of the church!

I met another curious illustration of this theological ingenuity at one time in London. A Dominican friar had been commissioned to raise funds in England for the conduct of the process of canonisation of a French priest. He had with him a number of small patches of black cloth, which were said to be portions of the cassock of the holy man. He could not sell these—the sale of relics is a grave sin in theology—but he was, like the Spanish Church with its indulgences, prepared to give one to every Catholic who gave him ten shillings for the cause. My colleagues made a friendly calculation that the relics which were being thus distributed all over the Catholic world were so large and numerous that they would make a considerable number of cassocks. Possibly the cloth had grown, as the Holy Cross did in pre-critical days; but we further noted that the relics were pieces of excellent stuff, whereas it was recorded as a particular proof of the saint's piety that he always wore an old and ragged cassock. All this criticism was passed at the time by priests, for it must not be supposed that the clergy are as credulous as they like the laity to be. They know that the manufacture of relics is a lucrative ecclesiastical industry. The Dominican, in fact, admitted to us that his relics had merely touched the original cassock of the saint, and we forced him, under threat of exposure, to return a half sovereign a lady had given him.

The Jesuits are the most flourishing body of regular clergy in England and America, and in every other civilised or uncivilised nation. The reason of their success is not far to seek. St. Ignatius bade them from the start cultivate the powerful and wealthy and found colleges for the young. They have been more than faithful to this part of his teaching, and they draw numbers of youths from their fine colleges. To a good supply of men and money they add a rigorous discipline, and the elements of success are complete. A famous Roman caricature hits off very happily the characteristic feature of the Jesuits and of three other orders by a play on the words of Peter to Christ. A Franciscan, Dominican, Augustinian, and Jesuit are seated at a table of money; the Franciscan repels it with the words "Behold we have left all things," the Dominican imitates him, "And we have followed thee," the Augustinian strikes an argumentative attitude, asking, "What then?" and the Jesuit gathers in the spoils, with the rest of the text, "remains for us."

At the same time they are characterised by a remarkable esprit de corps which leads to an intense isolated activity. The glory of the society is paramount, and always coupled with the glory of the Church; they never co-operate with other orders, but they freely cut across the lines of, and come into collision with, other ecclesiastical forces. Hence there is a very strong feeling against them amongst the clergy and in higher quarters; indeed, one would be surprised to find how many priests are ready to agree with Kingsley and Zola with regard to them. In considering the accusations that are so commonly brought against them one must remember how far the acknowledged principles of Catholic casuistry can be extended. It is true that the maxim, "The end justifies the means," is denounced by all the theological schools, including the Jesuits, but the rejection is at times little more than a quibble. An act which remains intrinsically bad cannot be done for a good purpose, they say, but every theologian admits that the "end" of an action enters into and modifies its moral essence; and the act must be a very wicked one which cannot be hallowed by being pressed into the service of the Church Catholic—or of the Society of Jesus.

Such quibbles as Kingsley attributes to them in "Westward Ho!" are certainly defensible on Catholic principles and are constantly perpetrated by priests;¹ and I should not be at all surprised if a Jesuit were to argue himself into accepting the commission which George Sand attributes to the Jesuit tutor in "Consuelo." Many priests would admit that M. Zola's account of their activity, in "Rome," is probably correct. I once heard F. Bernard Vaughan, S.J., preach a sermon on the title "What is a Jesuit?" With his accustomed eloquence he summed up the traditional idea—the historian's idea—of a Jesuit, and, in refutation, contented himself with detailing the spiritual exercises through which the Jesuit so frequently passes. Although, aided by F. Vaughan's great theatrical power and by the operatic performances which preceded and followed it, the sermon produced considerable effect, it was in reality merely a trick of rhetoric. No one contends that the Jesuit is violating his conscience in his plots, intrigues, and equivocations; regret is usually felt that he should have been able to bring his moral sense into such an accommodating attitude. Every ecclesiastic claims to be unworldly in ultimate ambition; yet even a pope would think a lifetime well spent in diplomatic intrigue for the restoration of his temporal power. All such activity is easily covered by the accepted principles of Catholic casuistry.

Still, whatever may have been the policy of Jesuits

in past ages their activity in England at the present day is patent. In London they have no parish, but they are continually seeking out the wealthier Catholics in various parishes and endeavouring to attach them to their congregation at Farm Street, or send them to help their struggling missions at Stamford Hill and Wimbledon. They even penetrated to Forest Gate in this "poaching" spirit, and my colleagues were greatly agitated when a Jesuit was known to be about. We usually lost a well-to-do parishioner. They have thus excited much hostility amongst the rest of the clergy, but four centuries of bad treatment from clergy and laity alike have sufficiently inured them, and only made them more self-contained and independent. Apart from such petty intrigues for the advancement of the society there does not seem to be any deep undercurrent of Jesuit activity in England at the present time; at Rome, of course, every congregation and every individual must participate in the great struggle for canonical existence.¹

Besides the great orders there are innumerable minor congregations of regular or monastic priests represented in London—Oblates of Mary, Oblates of the Sacred Heart, Oblates of St. Charles, Servites, Barnabites, Vincentians, Fathers of Charity, Marists, Passionists, Redemptorists, &c. Most of them have been founded in recent times by priests who were eager to promote some particular devotion, and, by influence or money, succeeded in getting permission to found congregations embodying their idea. As a rule their ideal is not very ascetic, so that there is less hypocrisy in their lives; but they also are generally too hard pressed in the mere struggle for existence to pay much attention to the particular features and objects of their respective congregations. I knew little of them, but used to hear my older colleagues tell with pleasure how Cardinal Manning scornfully spoke of the Brompton Oratory as "the hen-coop," and how the Benedictines were rent with factions (as one of them afterwards described in the Pall Mall Magazine).

Besides the great number of regular clergy—who would be more aptly styled the "Irregulars," both for a disciplinary reason and in view of their canonical relation to the rest of the clerical army—there are the ordinary secular or non-monastic clergy. The seculars are those who live in the world (sæculum) and the regulars those who live in convents, under a rule (regula). The seculars have a similar life to that of the ordinary non-Catholic clergyman; it has been fully described in the preceding chapter, for it is similar to that of the monastic clergy who undertake parochial duties. On Sunday their work is long and laborious. During the week they visit their parishioners, and the more attractive amongst their neighbour's parishioners (which dangerous practice is called "poaching," and is watched accordingly); take tea and supper and play cards with them; visit, dine, and wine with each other; and picnics, parties, entertainments, meetings, special services (with luncheons), visits to the cardinal (after a polite and chilling invitation called a compareat), and occasional holidays, help to fill up the inside of the week. They are forbidden under pain of suspension to enter a theatre, or witness theatrical performances of any kind.

They cordially detest the monastic clergy—who have secured most of the best parishes of the diocese—but do not object to dining with them on their festivals. I remember hearing one at a dinner (or near the close of a dinner) in a friary belonging to our Franciscan rivals, unburden his mind about monks in general and our friars in particular, in a way which would have been warmly approved by the most loyally Protestant body. With nuns they are usually on very good terms; they find pupils and novices for the convent, and in return are invited to the innumerable special services, luncheons, entertainments, distributions of prizes, &c., which are equally gratifying to them and the sisters.

Their circumstances, naturally, differ very widely in different parishes; as a rule they are not rich. I have known a priest to reduce his living expenses to nine shillings per week, and I should think there are few who have £150 per annum. However, they live in hopes of better days. The State grant to their schools has meant a material increase in their personal income. They, of course, claim it as a relief to their parishioners, but in point of fact the special collections they make for their schools are and always were insignificant.

The cardinal usually assists the poorest missions, in some of which, as at Ongar in my time, there are not a score of Catholics; at least Cardinal Manning did, though Cardinal Vaughan withdrew most of his predecessor's allowances. They were more afraid of having money taken from them by Cardinal Vaughan than of the contrary, and they filled up their statistical papers with much ingenuity. Cardinal Manning took little interest in the incomes and expenditures of his clergy, but as soon as Vaughan arrived they all received a detailed form to fill in and return, giving an account of their receipts and expenses. Unfortunately the cardinal made a canonical slip in sending the same paper to the secular and to the monastic clergy; the latter are not responsible to him for their conduct quâ monks, but only quâ parish priests. They therefore held an indignation meeting and protested, with the result that a new form had to be printed which distinguished between their parochial property and income and their monastic affairs, and only demanded an account of the former. Needless to say, the replies were very discreet; it is said that the Dominicans returned a blank sheet.

On the whole the relation of the secular clergy to their archbishop¹ may be described as one of good-natured tolerance. He was not popular in the north, and he is not popular in the south. He is kind and affable, and always leaves a good impression after a visit to a priest. Not so inflexible as his predecessor—in fact, it is complained that he is too easily influenced—he is a prelate of unquestionable earnestness and sincerity. But he had the misfortune to step into the shoes of a great man, and he has acted unwisely in endeavouring to tread in his predecessor's footsteps instead of confining his attention to the administration of the archdiocese. The intense activity which has kept him continually on the move since he entered the diocese, and which has so rapidly aged him, has had little or no palpable result, and has certainly not deepened the attachment of his clergy. His predecessor remained day after day in his little room at Carlyle Place; the world came to him and sought his influence.

Yet with all his activity and the perpetual fluttering of aristocratic wings in his vicinity he cannot give the financial aid to his clergy which his predecessor did. One of his first cares was to change the existing financial arrangements, cutting off many allowances and commanding new contributions. He had a perfect right to do so; but when, after so many economical measures, he confessed in his Trinity Sunday pastoral that he could not reach the income of his predecessor his clergy felt little sympathy. In the same pastoral he preached a panegyric of the aristocracy which gave great offence, and he gave a comparison of the contributions of five West End churches and five East End churches, which was not quite accurate, was hardly fair, and was certainly impolitic. However, he has made many wise changes in the distribution of his clergy and other improvements that Cardinal Manning had strangely neglected. When the time comes it will not be a light task to find a worthy successor to Cardinal Vaughan.²

The same may be said of the education of secular priests as of that of regulars; in fact, the observations in the preceding chapter apply to the clergy generally. The classical and mathematical training of the seculars is slightly better than that of the friars; otherwise the curriculum is much the same. Their philosophical and theological studies in the seminary have been equally disorderly and precipitate. They have had no serious introduction either to the thought of past ages (beyond the thirteenth century) or to the living thoughts of our own day. They read little and know little beyond the interminable Anglican controversy. The laity are coerced into literary apathy, and consequently the stimulus to study is absent.

About five years ago the cardinal realised that his priests were not up to date, and that they were really unable to bring themselves adequately in touch with modern thought, so he instituted a kind of intellectual committee to sit upon modern questions, and report to the majority. A dozen of the better-informed London priests constituted it, and they met occasionally to discuss, especially social questions and the biblical question. I remember procuring a large amount of socialistic literature for certain members who wished to study both sides. When the members of this new Areopagus had come to a few decisions, they were to enlighten their less studious or less leisured brethren by a series of small books. Those books have not yet appeared. The fact that the proposed writers (to my knowledge) dare not print their true ideas on the above problems at present may not be unconnected with the delay. A Jesuit writer, about the same time, began a series of explanatory and very dogmatic articles on the critical question in the Tablet, but he was immediately cut to pieces by other Catholic writers. The Jesuits have also published a series of volumes of scholastic philosophy in English. The student will find in them an acquaintance with modern science and philosophy which is rarely found in the scholastic metaphysician. Unfortunately they are little better on the main lines of argument than a translation of the discarded Latin manuals. They follow disused shafts of thought much too frequently to be of value. The more important volumes seem to have been entrusted to the less important men; and whilst there is much acute criticism of minor topics, the treatment of the more profound problems is very unsatisfactory—such theses as the spirituality of the soul and the existence and infinity of God being merely supported by the old worn-out arguments.

It is said that John attempted a smart aphorism on the family; he himself represented thought, Bernard word, and Herbert deed. When Bernard heard it he caustically added, "and Jerome omission." The allusion is to the Catholic classification of sins—sins of thought, word, deed, and omission.

What has been said of the perpetual intrigues of the monastic clergy does not apply so forcibly to the secular priests. Each monastery is a small world in itself, and contains nearly as many officers as privates; to the secular clergy the number of possible appointments is very slight in proportion to their numbers, and thus the fever of ambition is less widespread. There is naturally a certain amount of intrigue for the wealthier parishes, but few of the priests have any ambition beyond the desire to settle down as rector of some comfortable and respectable congregation. In a witty French book a benevolent parent gives as a supreme counsel to his son who has become a priest, "Arrondissez-vous." A few may then aspire to the dignity of dean of their district, or to the title of "missionary rector." But so far there is no difference from the clergy of any other denomination; the genuine Roman fever only begins with the narrow circle of those who presume to aspire to the title of monsignore, or even of canon of the diocese. The dignity of monsignore is not a very significant one; it may or may not be a reward of merit. Any wealthy priest of good family may receive it as a mere compliment. I know one monsignore who received his purple because he had given a few thousand pounds to my colleagues, and another (a very worthy man, but painfully commonplace) who got it for his attentions to a distinguished visitor from Rome.

Even canons, as a rule, are very feeble and harmless conspirators; they are generally old men, who are more conspicuous for quantity than quality of service, but have usually sufficient discretion left to know that they are not expected to aspire any higher. In matters of ordinary administration their long experience is often useful to the bishop, with whom they form the chapter of the diocese, but otherwise they have not a very grave responsibility. The same may be said of the titular bishops, or those whose titles are in partibus infidelium—the "suffragans"¹ of the Anglican hierarchy. The cardinal (or any important bishop) has a number of advisers quite outside his chapter, experts in canon law, professors of theology, &c., who are generally mutually hostile and contradictory, and from their opinions he finally deduces a course of action.

There is little excitement or intrigue over the election to an unimportant bishopric. A private income is as good a qualification as any where the diocese is small and poor, and no great energy is required for its administration. When the bishopric of Clifton fell vacant a few years ago, it was laughingly whispered in clerical circles that the first condition required in the candidate was the possession of the modest private income of £250 a year. When an important see is vacant there is more wire-pulling, both in the locality and at Rome; for the diocese has not a decisive vote in the election of its bishop. The canons meet and decide upon three names to send to Rome as dignissimus, dignior, and dignus. But the Pope frequently changes the order, and sometimes (as in Manning's election) entirely disregards the ternum.

Thus it is that every prominent ecclesiastic, whether he be bishop, priest, or monk (for a monk may be raised to the episcopate without intermediate stages), is a continuous object of jealous observation and intrigue, in view of the possible cardinals' hats or bishoprics. The state of things described in Purcell's "Life of Manning" is only exceptional in that the Church in England is not likely again to have such a number of able men simultaneously. The jealousy, hostility, meanness, and persecution therein described are familiar incidents in the life of every "great ecclesiastical statesman," as Manning is most aptly called. And it must not be imagined that the picture is at all complete—it is not by any means as darkly shaded as the reality. No Catholic could in conscience tell all that is handed down in clerical circles with regard to the relations of Manning, Newman, Ward, the Jesuits, &c. And although the author has made a generous concession in the cause of historical truth, the public have not had the full benefit of his sincerity. If the book could have been published in its original form, it would have been much more interesting, but after spending two years in purgatorial flames as it did, we must take it with discretion. Some of my colleagues were intimate with the author's brother, and gave us continual reports of the painful progress of the work. About two years before its appearance we were told that it was finished, and some very spicy letters and anecdotes were promised. Then there were rumours of war; the defenders of Manning, the supporters of Ward, the Jesuits, and others threatened legal action, and the work was much "bowdlerised." On the whole, the impression of those who seemed to be in the secret was that Newman had been treated by all parties in a manner that dare not be made public, and that there were documents kept back which would throw much discredit upon all other prominent Catholics of the period. We must not suppose, however, that Newman was the meek victim of all this intrigue. Bishop Paterson, who knew him well, once described him in my presence as "a tiger by nature, an angel by grace."

However undesirable such a state of things may be, it is no other than any disinterested person would expect. The Church cannot change its character in a day, and its past history, like the history of every priesthood under the sun, is throughout marred by such weaknesses. The life of Cardinal Pie in France, though written by a Catholic for Catholics, gives one the same impression; the relations of the Irish prelates (one of whom is "primate of Ireland," and another "primate of all Ireland,") and of the American prelates are quite analogous; and Rome itself is a school of diplomacy and intrigue of no gentle character. Such things are inevitable, and it is a clumsy device to attempt to conceal them and support the idea that ecclesiastical dignitaries are only guided by preternatural influences.

The condition of Catholicism in London is a matter of anxious discussion, even in clerical circles. As will be explained subsequently, grave doubts are expressed as to whether the Church is making any progress at all in England, and especially in London. Catholic journals are not unlike Egyptian monuments; they write large (and in good round numbers) the conquests of their Church, but they do not see the need for chronicling its losses. Of converted Anglican ministers they speak with warmth and eloquence; of seceding priests they are silent—until some incident brings them into public notice, when they publish a series of reckless attacks on them and refuse to insert their explanations. Once or twice, however, notices of meetings have crept in at which the opinion has been maintained by priests that the Church is really losing, instead of making that miraculous progress which the average layman believes. Great numbers of Catholics imagine that as soon as the Church of England is disestablished¹ and thus thrown directly upon the support of the people it will vanish almost immediately. I once heard Bishop Paterson explain that it was undesirable to work for disestablishment just yet, because we Catholics really had not nearly sufficient accommodation for the vast flood of converts that would ensue; we should be quite disorganised.

In point of fact there should be now about a quarter of a million Catholics in London, whereas the Daily News census shows that only 90,000 attend church, and the total number cannot therefore be more than 120,000. Throughout England the ratio of the Catholic population is about 1 in 20, but it is much higher in Lancashire, much lower in London and other places. In Cardinal Manning's time the figures were vague and disputable. When Cardinal Vaughan came down in a hurricane of zeal a census was made of the archdiocese; but the exact figures only established the truth of the pessimistic theory. It was thought that Catholicism did not really know its strength, and that it would be well to proclaim its formidable statistics to the world; but when the result of the census was known, it was whispered indeed from priest to priest, but with a caution that the cardinal did not wish to see it in print.

I have not seen the exact figures—I do not suppose they ever passed the archbishop's study in writing—but I was informed by reliable priests that out of the small Catholic population of London between 70,000 and 80,000 never went near a church—had practically abandoned the Church. I have explained that the positive ceremonial obligations (to hear mass) of a Catholic are so grave that a continued neglect of them puts a man outside the pale of the Church. Most priests can ascertain with some confidence how many nominal Catholics there are in their district—that is to say, how many ought to be Catholics by parentage, baptism, education, &c. By subtracting from this the average number of attendances at mass on Sunday (an obligatory service) they should have the number of renegades. So, also, the priest can make a minimum calculation from his school-children—multiply the number of children by five, and you have the population (though in some places many Catholic children attend Board Schools); and the number of marriages affords a maximum indication.

Disagreeable as the general statement is, a few details will show that it must be rather under than over the truth. The priest, as a rule, likes to give as roseate an account as possible of his flock, so that in the aggregate there is probably a great loss in point of accuracy. In the parish of Canning Town in East London there are about 6000 nominal Catholics; 5000 of these never come near the church. I was dining with F. Hazel the day the form to be filled arrived, and saw him write it. We measured the church and found that, filling the doorsteps and arch ledges, it would not contain more than 400; certainly not a thousand, mostly children, came to mass on Sundays, and Easter confessions were proportionate. A question was asked, How many of your youths (15–21) attend their duties? About five per cent. was the answer.

The income of the parish was deplorable; the vast territory it embraces is full of poor Irish families who live less religiously and not more virtuously than pagans.

At Barking there are more than 200 children in the schools, and the number is not at all complete, and there are not more than fifty adults who attend church; at Grays there is the same condition. A few years ago a zealous priest, F. Gordon Thompson, determined to start a mission in a neglected part of East London—Bow Common; his aim was necessarily small, he could only hope to take care of the children of nominal Catholics. In the first three streets he visited he found 120 such children, and could go no further; their parents he could not attempt to gather. He told me that there were several other localities in East London in precisely the same condition. In fact, every parish in East London counts at least hundreds of drifted Catholics. The circumstance is by no means confined to poor districts, but it is more noticeable in them; ecclesiastics are naturally slow to undertake and prosecute such unreimunerative toil.

In the light of these details it will not be wondered that there is so great a leakage from the Church that the "converts" do not nearly fill the vacant space.¹ I have thought for many years, and have been confirmed in the opinion by many colleagues, that for the last twenty years at least the Church of Rome has made no progress in England, but has probably lost in numbers, taking into account, of course, the increase of a generation. The Church has made a considerable number of converts, and it would be foolish to question the earnestness of a large proportion of them. At the same time the majority of them are of such a class that the change has no deep religious significance. There are thousands of ordinary people whose only convictions, such as they are, regard certain fundamental points of Christianity, and who are drawn into one or other sect by the merest accident—by contact with a zealous or particularly affable proselytiser, by the influence of relatives, by kindness, taste, and a host of non-religious considerations. In fact it is only too clear (and not unnatural) that many associate with the Church of Rome out of purely æsthetic considerations. It is well known that many of the much vaunted converts of Farm Street and of Brompton are simply æsthetes, who are attracted by the sensuous character of the services.

¹ I have since made careful research into the matter, and more than established the truth of this. My conclusions are given in an article in the National Review for August 1901, and especially in my "Decay of the Church of Rome" (1909), where I have shown that the Church of Rome has lost at least two million and a quarter followers in England alone during the nineteenth century. Third edition.

Matrimonial considerations are also very powerful agents in the cause of the Church. Many Catholic priests and families insist upon “conversion” before admitting a non-Catholic to matrimonial relation. The only “convert” I am responsible for was a young lady who was engaged to be married to a Catholic; she drank in my instructions like water, never finding the slightest intellectual difficulty; and a few years afterwards, being jilted by him, she happily returned to Anglicanism with the same facility. One of my colleagues was summoned to attend a Catholic who was seriously ill. The wife met him at the door, and asked him to "be careful, because her husband was only a marriage-convert." When inter-marriage is allowed, the Church exacts several promises in her favour; all children of the marriage must be brought up Catholics, the non-Catholic partner must promise not to interfere in any way with the religion of the Catholic parent and children—and then the Catholic is separately bound to do all in his or her power to convert the other.

Schools, too, are proselytising agencies. In boarding-schools kept by nuns, to which Protestant girls are frequently sent, it is regarded as a sacred duty to influence the children as much as possible, no matter what promises are made to the parents. Elementary public schools are not only the most effective guardians of their own children, but also help to extend Catholic influence. Like the consideration which has been previously mentioned, it is not one to which the clergy give political prominence, but it is certainly an important item in their secret programmes.

CHAPTER X

COUNTRY MINISTRY

AFTER four years' experience of the life which has been described in the preceding pages, I was not unwilling to find some means of escape. Besides the uncongenial environment in which I found myself, my religious troubles had increased every year, until at length I found myself consciously speculating on the possibility of being ultimately forced to secede. The prospect was naturally very painful and alarming, and I resolved to use every honourable means to avert it. However, in the increasing cares of the ministry I could not secure the necessary time for sustained study. I was relieved from monastic duties, and also from parochial work, on account of my professorship: I never visited or received visitors until the last six months of my monastic career. Still, as preacher, confessor, instructor, and professor, I was continually distracted and failing in health, and I eagerly grasped an opportunity of retiring from London.

The authorities of our province had at length decided to take action for the improvement of our studies, and F. David was directed to found a new college for the preparatory studies. He had a large but vague idea that the college was ultimately to be connected with Oxford University, and sent down a friar of high reputation for economy to make inquiries in that region. However, no land could be obtained at their price nearer than Buckingham, and there the friar established himself.

The friar lived in the vicinity during the progress of the building, which was erected principally on borrowed funds, as is usual with Roman Catholic institutions. Knowing that the financial prospects of the college were precarious, the good friar set himself to live with great economy and store up a little against the opening of the establishment. He had an excellent reputation for economy already: he knew all the halfpenny 'buses in London, and patronised shops where a cup of tea could be had for a halfpenny. However, he surpassed himself at Buckingham. He read by the light of a street lamp which shone in at his window (thus saving the cost of oil), had no servant, and achieved the fabulous feat of living on sixpence per day¹ during a long period. Being forced at length to keep a lay-brother he chose a poor little ascetic who, he knew, was only too eager to find a superior who would allow him to starve himself on orthodox principles.

When at length it was deemed expedient to remove the zealous friar to another part of England, he had saved the sum of £100. This he left to his successor, who, accordingly, in recording his disappearance in the "Annals" of the new college, added that he deserved great praise for the efficient state in which he left the mission. But the newcomer had quite a different theory of life. He agreed with Francis of Assisi that it was irreverent to make provision for the morrow; and so he made himself comfortable in the little cottage they had rented, and religiously trusted to Providence for the future of the college. The income was also doubled through a kind of chaplaincy to the Comte de Paris which he undertook, yet when I succeeded him my legacy consisted mainly of wine and spirit bills (paid) and empty bottles.

In the meantime the councillors were again at loggerheads over the choice of a rector. F. David had asked me to volunteer for the post, and, for the reasons already given, and from a sincere desire to help in reforming our studies, I did so. Subsequent proceedings, however, disgusted me to such an extent that for a time I refused to take it, and several authorities, knowing that I would now have to work in the face of much intrigue and secret opposition, wished to save me from it. I was finally appointed, and entered upon my duty willingly and with earnest and honest purpose. I had incurred the bitter but secret hostility of those who were ostensibly responsible for my financial success; I knew that the province was almost universally hostile to the new foundation; my parish, of some twelve miles in extent, contained only three poor Catholics; and I had eight pupils who paid between them the collective sum of £80 per annum. I had now entered the troubled waters of ecclesiastical intrigue, and I give a few details in illustration of that interesting experience.

Immediately after my arrival the cabinet ministers of the fraternity—who had prudently sent me a ten pound note in advance—came to the college to hold a two days' conference. During those two days the little college resounded with loud but, unhappily, inarticulate discourse. When it was over I demanded instructions from the provincial, a worthy but obtuse old friar, who, by some curious freak of diplomacy, had been pushed into the highest position. He blandly replied that he had no instructions for me. I (aged twenty-seven) was to be chief professor and rector, superior of the house, instructor of the lay-brothers, parish priest—everything, in short; with carte blanche to make any regulations, programme of study, or domestic discipline that I desired. I was even free to adopt or not the "closure" (excluding ladies). I then turned to the delicate financial question, and was promptly assured that the whole of this responsibility had been undertaken by one of the definitors. I afterwards ascertained that neither the provincial nor the other councillors had any idea of the financial condition of the institution. I warned him that the defnitor in question was known to be anxious for my ruin and humiliation (for my spiritual good), and that the others could not shift their responsibility. He smiled, shrugged his shoulders, and departed. I never saw him again.

Under these auspicious circumstances I opened the college of St. Bernardine, a large and handsome building, in spacious grounds just outside Buckingham, in October 1895. During the five months I remained there I received no help from the friar of whom they had spoken; at the end of the time he stood in my debt. I knew that he had another and more docile candidate waiting for the rectorship, and that he had openly expressed his intention of letting me "sink."

However, other friars came to my assistance, and I left the college comparatively prosperous when I abandoned it.

I had one associate in teaching, a young and kindly but ignorant priest, so that a curious assortment of classes fell to my lot. I taught Latin grammar, French, Euclid, algebra, physics, and a little Greek. And the difficulty of educating the boys was increased by my complete ignorance of the term they were to remain under me. I remonstrated with the authorities in vain; they were in utter discord themselves, and left everything to chance. Some of them hoped that the institution would fail. To enliven still further the monotony of our country life there was a revolt of the two servants or lay-brothers, occasioned by my checking their beer accounts. They were both older than myself, selfish, unsympathetic, and impatient of discipline. The authorities refused to remove them.

At the same time the bishop of the diocese was piteously calling my attention to the condition of the district, and putting a new charge on my shoulders. There was evidently more duplicity on this point. I was informed that there was no parish attached to the college; the bishop understood that there was, and had promised me a map of it. It mattered little, for the "parish" would consist of an enormous extent of territory containing three Catholics known and three or four suspected. The town of Buckingham (containing 3000 inhabitants) boasts of one Roman Catholic, who, with rustic diplomacy, attended early service at the parish church and mass afterwards at the college. He was my gardener. The whole diocese of Northampton is a spiritual desert to the Catholic mind. It is the most extensive in England, yet contains only a few thousand Catholics.

At Buckingham I was expected to re-kindle the light of the ancient faith in a very short time. My predecessors had left glowing accounts of the ripeness of the harvest. But I soon found that the easy tolerance, if not cordiality, of the townsfolk had quite a different meaning. The presence of the French soi-disant royal family had done much to remove the unreasonable prejudice against Catholics which is found in many agricultural districts. Stowe House had been the chief support of the little town; and when the Orleanist family departed, after the death of the Count, the town was prepared to receive with open arms any institution that would help to fill the void in its commerce. The college was built just at that moment, and as my colleagues predicted for it a rapid and unlimited growth, it was warmly welcomed by the inhabitants, who, no doubt, religiously steeled their hearts at the same time against its assumed proselytising purpose. In fact, I found that one or two men who had been noted by my predecessors as likely to prove the first and easiest converts were confirmed agnostics who had keenly enjoyed the simplicity of my predecessors. It was soon felt that I was not of a proselytising disposition—apart from the insecurity of my own position, I am afraid that I never sufficiently realised the gravity of the condition of our Anglican neighbours—and the college worked in complete harmony with the Protestant clergy and laity of the vicinity.

Of my own diocesan colleagues I hardly made the acquaintance. The nearest priest of my own diocese was at a distance of twelve miles to the south; the next, fourteen miles to the north; and there, as elsewhere, the secular clergy do not fraternise with monks. I was now, however, bound to put in an appearance at the casuistry conferences which are held periodically, as has been explained. A diocese is divided into deaneries, and the rectors are summoned every month to a conference at the dean's residence. A programme is printed for each year in which a casus—an incident for moral diagnosis and prescription—is appointed for each conference; a few questions are added which serve to elicit the principles of casuistry on which the "case" must be solved. A priest is appointed to read the case, solve it, and answer the questions at each meeting; all are then invited by the dean or president to express their opinions in turn, and, as the casus is usually very complicated, a long discussion generally follows.¹ Nearly every point in casuistry is disputed, and arguments are abundant in the modern Latin manuals—Lehmkuhl, Ballerini, Palmieri, &c. The final decision rests with the president.

A conference in a populous diocese is a very exciting ceremony; rival schools of theology are represented, ¹ The casus are always in Latin: the following may serve as a specimen:—Titius steals a watch from the person of a cleric in church. This he sells to Caius, and nothing further is heard of him. The priest at length identifies his watch in the possession of Caius and claims it, satisfactorily proving it to be his property. Caius refuses to return the watch until his money is returned and the thief cannot be traced.

Q. 1. How many kinds of sacrilege are there?

Q. 2. How many sins did Titius commit?

Q. 3. How is the case to be solved?

Such a case would provoke hours of controversy.

young priests are pitted against old ones, and the more ambitious are eager to make an impression. But at Northampton our conference was very tame. Only ten priests could be assembled out of a very wide territory, and they were far from being brilliant theologians. A desultory and not very instructive conversation ensued after the case had been read, and in the middle of it the bell rang for lunch, which seemed, of the two, to be the more important function for which we were convened.

The life of a priest in a country parish is usually very dull and monotonous; in our diocese it was not unlike the life of a foreign missionary, so few Catholics there were in the vast territory. I had one parishioner in the town, a poor ignorant creature whose faith was very closely connected with his works; another at a distance of four miles, who was a doubtful acquisition to the Church; a third, five miles away, who patiently submitted to being called a Catholic; and a fourth, or rather an excellent family, about eight miles away, who had been effectually scared from us by my predecessors. The three or four mythical Catholic harvestmen and washerwomen, whom a diocesan tradition located somewhere within the limits of my twelve-mile district, I never met in the flesh. Most of the other priests in the diocese had rather more souls to care for, but rarely sufficient to provide a maintenance. They were poor, and could not travel much; they had few parishioners with whom they could have congenial intercourse; they were widely separated from each other, and had neither books nor inclination to study. The life of an Anglican clergyman in a small country parish is not one to be envied: a priest has the additional disadvantage of no family, and usually hostile neighbours.

When I had at length introduced a certain amount of method into the college and of discipline into my small community, my thoughts reverted to the personal object I had in view in leaving London. Surprise is often expressed that the number of seceders from the Roman Catholic priesthood is not higher. Apart from the fact that few people know the number of seceders, as will appear presently, a little reflection on two points, which I have already adduced, will help to explain the matter. In the first place, the philosophical and theological studies of the priest have been stunted, one-sided, and superficial. Very few of the clergy have continued the work at a university, and even there the studies would again be narrow and superficial. They plunge into active parochial work immediately after their ordination; they have no stimulus to, and little continuous time for, study—except a little casuistry—while, on the other hand, there is ample opportunity and pressing invitation to dissipate their time and wits in agreeable trivialities. Under such circumstances they feel disposed to regard Wellhausen and Kuenen (or even Sayce and Cheyne), Huxley and Spencer, White and Draper, and even Protestant divines, as so many literary hedgehogs. Their scholastic system was plausible enough when the professor urged it upon them, and they give no further thought to the subject. Add to this the fact that most of them are Irish, and the buoyant Celtic temperament does not take religious doubt very seriously; no one knows into what depths of study or seas of trouble it may lead. In the educated layman that temperament is sceptical enough, though it is a careless, lighthearted scepticism, not obtrusive and not very consistent; in the priest the same disposition leads to a natural reluctance to take any steps that may involve a violent dislocation, and carries with it a habit of deprecating a Quixotic effort to attain mathematical precision and consistency of thought.

And if it happens that doubts do enter into the minds of the clergy (and in familiar intercourse with them one soon finds that they are not uncommon—I have sometimes heard priests openly express the most cynical scepticism), what time has the ordinary priest to make a sincere and protracted study of his opinions? With all my privileges and opportunities for study, it cost me the better part of ten years of constant reading and thought to come to a final and reliable decision. The fact that the actual seceders from the Church are usually men who have had special opportunity and a marked disposition for study is significant enough; the fact that few emerge from the ordinary ranks of the clergy with convictions firm enough to face the painful struggle of secession should not be surprising. Active external occupation banishes doubt from consciousness. To deliberately resort to it for that purpose would be dishonest; few men would subscribe to the Catholic rule, that doubt must be suppressed at once, yet it is the ordinary fate of the clergyman. I experienced a relief myself during the initial labours for my college, but once my work dropped into some kind of routine, the old questions reappeared, and I determined to answer them, cost what it might.

My doubts were of a philosophical and fundamental character. I had felt that, until the basic truths of religion were firmly assented to, the Anglican controversy had little interest for me, and even the biblical question was of secondary importance. Accordingly most of my time from my first introduction to philosophy was spent, directly or indirectly, in investigating the fundamental problems. I had read all the literature which could possibly be of use to me in forming my judgment, and I had been guided (as far as he could do so) by a man who is thought most competent for that purpose. All that remained was to survey the evidence as it had accumulated in my memory, and form a severe and well-weighed decision upon it. I drew up on paper the points round which my doubts centred, and added from memory all the arguments I had met in my protracted search. I was not at all influenced by hostile writers, of whom I had read very little, and I had never discussed the questions with any non-Catholic. The sole question was, Is the evidence I have collected satisfactory or not? During the Christmas vacation I settled resolutely to my task, and uninterruptedly, all day and half the night, I went solemnly back over the ground of my studies. Point by point the structure of argument yielded under the pressure. Before many days a heavy and benumbing consciousness weighed upon me that I was drifting out into the mist and the unknown sea. And it was on Christmas morning, 1895, after I had celebrated three masses, while the bells of the parish church were ringing out the Christ-message of peace, that, with a great pain, I found myself far out from the familiar land—homelessly, aimlessly drifting. But the bells were right, after all; from that hour I have been wholly free from the nightmare of doubt that had lain on me for ten years.

The literature that I had studied during the preceding years was principally Latin and French. I had, naturally, looked for evidence in the vast arsenal of Catholic apologetics, and though my study has been greatly extended since, I am not sure that any dialectically firmer evidence is available. The Kantist and Hegelian philosophies, and all that is grounded on either or both, Green, Fiske, Lotze, Royce, Caird, have left me untouched. The philosophy of the Scotch school, from Reid to Hamilton, is only plausible in so far as it is Aristotelic, and therefore a repetition of the scholastic system. Martineau also is unwittingly scholastic in his better passages, and he is too much disposed to that "extra-rational" proof which appealed to Mr. Romanes in his later years: for my part, I would not take a single serious step in this life on extra-rational proof, and I fail to see why it is a surer guide to the next. Thus I came to attach most importance to the schoolmen and the writers who adapt their principles to modern thought. I studied with extreme care St. Thomas, St. Bonaventure, Scotus, Suarez, Vasquez, Pontius, Herinx, and a host of other veterans; also an infinity of smaller modern writers, Tongiorgi, Sanseverino, Lepidi, Pesch, Moigno, Zigliara, Rosmini, Lacordaire, Monsabré, Zahn, Hettinger, &c.

Amongst English Catholic literature there was little to be read. In my younger days I had been taught to shelter myself under the authority of the great Newman: it was a very few years before I found that that was rather a compromising position for a philosopher. There is an old adage in the schools that "in philosophy an authority is worth just as much as his arguments, and no more." Newman is the last guide in the world to choose in philosophical matters. The key to his line of thought is found in the inscription (epitaph, one feels tempted to say) of his one philosophical work, "The Grammar of Assent"—a text from St. Ambrose, "Not by logic hath it pleased God to save His people." Newman was penetrated with that edifying sentiment, hence it is not surprising to find how faithfully he acts upon it in constructing the existence of God and the divinity of Christ. His one witness to God's existence is conscience (he says in one of his sermons that without it he would be an atheist), and under his ceaseless attentions conscience becomes a faculty which few ordinary human beings will recognise. His treatment of it is anything but scientific; it is highly imaginative and grossly anthropomorphic. The text from St. Ambrose is principally intended as a gauntlet for his rival, Dr. Ward; still, it is true that Newman had a profound contempt for metaphysics, and, like most people who much despise it, had no knowledge whatever of that science. It is usually assumed that Newman was a traditionalist,¹ but his poetical and unscientific method seems rather attributable to a wholesome dread of Kant; not that he shows evidence of intimate acquaintance with Kant's Critique, but he seems to have been vaguely convinced that Kant had undermined all metaphysical research, and his own splendid literary power enabled him to make a plausible defence of his opinions without the aid of philosophy. He is obviously no guide for a serious scientific mind.

His rival, Dr. Ward, also a prominent figure in the Oxford Movement, was the very antithesis of Newman. Newman used to speak contemptuously of the "dry bones" of Ward's logic, and evidently considered that his own works clothed them and made them attractive. Ward was an able dialectician, a subtle metaphysician, and a vigorous writer. His "Philosophy of Theism" is the best English defence of the scholastic philosophy, but is incomplete. J. S. Mill was leading him to the critical points of the system in a famous controversy, but it ended prematurely with Mill's death.

Dr. Mivart was certainly the most influential writer on the Catholic side of his day, and the most competent to discuss the eternal problems in the light in which they presented themselves to the nineteenth century. Issuing, as he did, from the Darwinian school, it is natural to find in him a breadth of view and seriousness of treatment that distinguish his works from those of clerical apologists. But Mivart was no metaphysician; hence his psychological criticism of Darwinism—his chief original contribution—rests on the enumeration of striking points of difference between animal and human faculties which are losing their force with every advance of science, and may yet be fully harmonised. On other points, such as the freedom of the will, the evolution of ethics, and the origin of the universe, he is extremely feeble; and he has a disposition to waste his strength upon the criticism of accidental phases and features of monism and agnosticism rather than upon their essential destructiveness. He himself unconsciously gave me the key to his position some time after I left the Church. In a genial talk at the Oriental Club he admitted that he had little or no belief in even the most distinctive dogmas of the Church. He literally laughed at the doctrine of the miraculous birth of Christ. "Do they really teach that in the seminaries?" he asked. What the limits of his scepticism were he seemed hardly to know himself. Nor was this a mere failure of his later years; it was a mature and resolute attitude. Mivart was then (two years before his death) in full vigour of mind and will. Yet I hasten to add that his position was perfectly honest, and I appreciated it, as he appreciated mine. He thought the Church of Rome the greatest spiritual force in existence, and so he would remain in it and help to remove the stress it lays on belief. There are still many like him in the Church, even amongst the clergy; there are many in every Church to-day. But such a position accounts for the weakness of his arguments on specific doctrines.

Of the Jesuit writers and their series of volumes on scholastic philosophy I have already spoken. Father Clarke and Father Maher are able and informed writers. They have passed some sound criticism on certain aspects of opposing systems, but they condemn themselves to futility by their Quixotic defence of the arguments of St. Thomas and the medieval philosophy. Of the Jesuit popular writers it is difficult to speak with politeness. Mr. Lilly belongs to the Platonic or sentimental group of apologists. Of Father Zahm and other lingering representatives of the school for harmonising religion and science little need be said beyond recalling the fate of their predecessors. Cardinal Manning's essay in apologetics hardly calls for mention. He was a man of action, not of speculation—certainly not a philosopher. His cast of mind is well illustrated by his words to one who was urging certain scientific statements in conflict with Genesis; without listening to them he blandly replied, like the Anglican bishop whom Mr. Stead consulted about the statements of the higher critics: "I don't believe them."

I had now exhausted every possible means of confirming myself in my position, and failed to do so. Apart from the fact that at that time it seemed to me that the loss of a belief in immortality made life irremediably insipid, I had fearful practical difficulties to expect if I seceded. I had every prospect of success in my position, or, if I preferred, I could have passed to the ranks of the secular clergy without difficulty. I consulted many friends and strangers, and I was confirmed in my resolution to terminate my sacerdotal career, allowing a few weeks for possible change of thought. As the manner of my secession curiously illustrates certain features of Roman Catholic methods and the general question of secession, I describe it at some length in the following chapter.

CHAPTER XI

SECESSION

THE Catholic layman has usually a fixed belief in the absolute integrity of his priesthood. He may entertain a suspicion of avarice, or indolence, or worldliness with regard to certain individuals, but in point of faith and morality he is quite convinced of the invulnerability of his pastors. At wide intervals a few may be found who are acquainted with the fact of a secession, but the report is usually confined with great care to the locality, and the Catholic press—proof against all the ordinary temptations of the journalist, when the honour of the Church is at stake—carefully abstains from disseminating the unwelcome news. Thus there are few laymen who know of more than one secession, and who are prepared to admit the possibility of a serious and conscientious withdrawal from their communion. Indeed, there are few priests who know that there have been more than a very few secessions from their ranks, so carefully are such events concealed wherever it is possible.

The secrecy is, of course, not the effect of accident, for such incidents are not devoid of public interest, and are matters of very deep concern to the Catholic body. The Roman Church claims such a monopoly of demonstrative evidence that it receives a check when its credentials are rejected by one who is so familiar with them; it is—or would be, if it were frankly admitted—a flat contradiction of their persistent teaching that their claims only need to be studied to be admitted. Hence the ecclesiastical policy is to conceal a secession, if possible, and, when it is made public, to represent it as dishonest and immoral. My own position would not for a moment be admitted to be bonâ fide. The gentler of my colleagues seem to think that a “light” has been taken from me for some inscrutable reason, whilst others have circulated various hypotheses in explanation, such as pride of judgment, the inebriation of premature honours, &c. But of some of my fellow-seceders I had heard, before I left the Church, the grossest and most calumnious stories circulated; pure and malicious fabrications they were, simply intended to throw dust in the eyes of the laity and to make secession still more painful. The majority of priests, when questioned by Catholics about a secession, will simply shake their heads and mutter the usual phrase: “Wine and women.”

But in the first instance every effort is made to keep secession secret, even from clerics. I have mentioned a case in the note on page 60 which is, I think, known only to a small number of ecclesiastics; the dignitary in question had not discharged any public function for some years, hence his disappearance was unnoticed. I elicited the fact with some difficulty, and was earnestly begged not to divulge it further. On another occasion at Forest Gate, I was asked to accompany a canon, who was giving a mission there at the time, to a certain address in the district. Noticing an air of secrecy about the visit, and a desire on the part of the good canon that I should remain outside, I entered the house with him, and found that it was occupied by an "apostate" priest. So much I learned by accident, but neither the canon nor my own colleagues would give me the slightest information about him. I never heard of him before or since, and know nothing of his character: I merely mention the incident as an illustration of the concealment of secessions.

And not only is silence enjoined, but deliberate falsehoods¹ are told with regard to seceders. One of our superiors at Forest Gate seceded or "apostatized." My colleagues deliberately told our parishioners that he had gone on the foreign missions—some of them, under pressure, giving details as to his destination; though they knew that he had only retired to Southend-on-Sea with the contents of the fraternal purse. I

¹ It has been already explained that these are not looked upon as falsehoods by Catholic theologians. The case given in the text is a more direct deception than usual; generally they are quibbles and equivocations which are covered by their remarkably elastic principles of mental reserve and of the necessity of avoiding scandal. Here is another illustration:—

I was informed one day at Forest Gate that one of my students had lodged a complaint against me with certain higher superiors. The accusation was entirely erroneous; the student had been deceived by another, and I desired to undeceive him by explaining. I accosted him immediately, and asked him if he had been complaining about me. He not only emphatically denied it, but endeavoured, by his manner, to give me the impression that it was the last thing in the world he would dream of. When I told him of the superior's words, he coolly replied that I had no right to question him, so he was at liberty to deny it. He was a well-educated man of thirty, the son of an Anglican minister, and, before he joined us, a man of honour and courage. He had been instructed to act as he did by the priests (hostile to me) with whom he had lodged the accusation.

was myself informed for a week that he had gone on the foreign missions, so that I could be relied upon not to spoil the story. I believe that even the cardinal was ignorant of the event, as a year afterwards his brother made inquiries of me as to the fate of the friar in question, of which he evidently knew nothing.

In these ways is the fiction of the preternatural integrity of the Catholic clergy maintained. How many priests have seceded from the Church in England it is impossible to say, but they are certainly more numerous than is usually supposed. They mingle quietly with the crowd, and rarely even come to know each other.¹ Many of them, such as Dr. Washington Sullivan, Dr. Klein, Dr. Wells, Mr. Addis, Mr. Hutton, Mr. Law, Mr. Galton, Mr. Sydney, or Mr. Hargrave, are men of scholarly attainments, and of high repute in the various bodies with which they have associated.

If it is thought that the number is not large in proportion to the number of priests in England, it must be remembered that their education, literary acquirements, and subsequent occupation are not of a nature to unsettle their minds very seriously. But a still more serious circumstance is the peculiarly painful nature of the breach with the Church of Rome. A breach with any lifelong communion is attended with much pain, and this is greater in the case of the minister of religion who finds himself impelled to that violent wrench of the affections which conscience occasionally dictates. He has formed definite habits of thought and life and innumerable attachments, and the severing of these is accompanied with a pain akin to the physical pain of dislocation and the wrenching asunder of nerves and fibres. In the Church of Rome, at least, secession means farewell to the past—farewell to whatever honour, whatever esteem and affection, may have been gained by a life of industry and merit. The decree of the Church goes forth against the “apostate.” He is excommunicated—cursed in this life and the next—and socially ostracised, if not slandered. The many, the great crowd of admirers, listen to every idle tale that is hatched against him; the few, whose moral and humane instincts are too deep to be thus perverted, can but offer a distant and stealthy sympathy. He is cast out to recommence life, socially and financially, in middle age; perhaps he is homeless, friendless, and resourceless. A description of my own experience of the ordeal may be instructive.

When I was forced at length to acknowledge that I had lost all faith in my religious profession, I thought to avail myself of my position as superior to enter into secular life with more facility. I revealed my state of mind to several non-Catholic acquaintances—it would have been fatal to my plans and quite useless to reveal it to a Catholic—and they agreed that I must withdraw, after a short time for reflection; only one man, a prominent public man in London, thought that I should be justified in remaining at my post.¹ I began, therefore, to make inquiries and preparations for a new departure. In the meantime I continued to fulfil my duty to the college conscientiously—as a matter of common honesty, and in order to give no ground for subsequent calumny.

For the same reason I resolved to take no money from the institution, though I felt that I should have been justified in doing so to some extent. When the superior of a monastery with which I was connected left its walls, he took £50 with him “as a temporary loan”; that circumstance did not excite any particular discussion, and certainly there was no question of prosecution for theft. Another friar ran away with about £200. My own case, however, was of quite a different character, and would be treated with a very different policy. The two friars were not genuine seceders from the Church. The second was clearly a case of wanton revolt against discipline; the first was rather doubtful—he returned to penance after a fruitless effort to find secular employment. In both cases it was evidently the policy of the fraternity to conceal the misdemeanour from the laity. These two remained priests, and for the credit of the Church and the prestige of its clergy their faults must be concealed at all costs. But when a priest really secedes from the Church the opposite policy is naturally followed; for the credit of the Church and the confusion of its enemies the seceder must be placed in as unfavourable a light as possible. I was too well acquainted with esoteric ecclesiastical teaching to be unprepared, so I determined to give them no handle.

Studies were conducted with perfect regularity; discipline was so severe that my inferiors chafed under it; my accounts were balanced almost from day to day.

At length, I was urgently entreated by a lady at Forest Gate to take her into my confidence, for it was seen that I was in great trouble. She was a clever, well-educated person with whom I was particularly friendly, and I told her of my intention, exacting strict secrecy, and intimating that a revelation would do me much injury, and that nothing could now detain me. I got an hysterical reply imploring me to remain in the Church, and saying that, in case of refusal, I should hear no more from her. She had been my kindest and closest friend in the Church of Rome; but she kept her word, handed my letter to my colleagues, and, so far as I know, she has never cared to learn a word further about the fortunes and bitter struggles of "the apostate."

A council of the fraternal cabinet was summoned immediately at Manchester, and Father David obtained discretionary power to act. It was certainly the intention of my friend, and possibly of the authorities, that Father David should induce me to communicate my difficulties and endeavour to remove them. He himself can hardly have expected that, as his guidance had been exhausted years before. On the night of his arrival he chatted amiably enough with me over the usual glass of wine, but as soon as he had closed the bank account in the morning, he curtly informed me that I was deposed from my position, and ordered to retire to the friary at Chilworth, in Surrey.

This friary is in a very secluded locality, and banishment to it was a recognised penal procedure. It is the novitiate of the fraternity, and in it I should be compelled to occupy all my time in formal religious exercises, and should be entirely cut off from the outside world, besides being expected to put my confidence in a superior who knew nothing of philosophy, and who would much rather burn an agnostic at the stake than argue with him. It would have been utterly useless for me to go there, now that my mind was firmly convinced. I preferred to remain and commence my new career with sympathetic friends. To avoid unpleasantness, however, I said nothing of my intention, and prepared to leave the college about the time of the departure of the train; but when formally asked if I intended to take the train, I refused to say. Meantime I had packed up my books, &c., and sent them to a friend's house. I balanced my books, and handed the surplus money to Father David, who was good enough to offer me the fraternal kiss at my departure; I declined it. I thus turned my back for ever, as I imagined, on monasticism, and hastened down to meet one or two kind and sympathetic friends.

The following morning I strolled down to my friend's office, and was surprised to find him closeted with a friar. It was one of my rebellious lay-brothers (though he had obtained an interview under a priest's name) who had brought a letter from the college. The letter was to acquaint my friend with the fact that a certain Mr. McCabe, who had been left in "temporary" charge of the college, had absconded with a quantity of valuable property belonging thereto; that the said stolen property was understood to be on his premises; and that he was informed, in a friendly way, that the matter was in the hands of the police. The writer signed himself M.A., though he had no degree in arts. He might contend that he was a "missionary apostolic." As a commentary on the letter, the friar gave my friend a long and interesting critique of my public character and mental capacity, and was turned out of the office. As it was impossible to get immediate legal advice we decided to await developments.

In point of fact, I knew there were a few books amongst my own, overlooked in the hurry of departure, which did belong to the college. I had fortunately already told my friend of this, and we intended to return them. But the complaint of my colleagues was not on this ground at all. Although they did not communicate with me on the subject—if they had done so the same arrangement would have been made without police-intervention—it appears that they claimed everything I had removed, and even the clothes I wore, which they expected me to ask of them as an alms. The claim was ostensibly based on my vow of poverty or abdication of the right of property. The fact that the college was just as incapable of ownership as I (on their peculiar theory) was ignored, and the new rector, Father David, claimed them in the name of the college. They were books and instruments (especially a telescope) which friends had given me on various occasions (every friar accumulates a quantity of such presents, which remain his, for all practical purposes). Legally (for canon law is happily not authoritative in England) they were my property, and I had no hesitation in thinking myself morally justified in retaining them after my conscientious labours, and especially since most of the donors were hardly aware of the college's existence, and certainly meant the gifts to be personal.

In the afternoon the police-sergeant appeared and claimed the property which had been "stolen from St. Bernardine's College." I believe that his proceedings were entirely illegal, though I was unfortunately not sure of it at the time. However, we disputed the ownership of the property, and he at once retreated. Then, in order to avoid litigation, I promised to surrender a large number of books if Father David would come to claim them. Father David came, again bringing, to the increasing astonishment of the little town, the representative of law and order. We effected a rough division of the books, and the telescope was referred to the donor, who awarded it to me. The next day, wearied to death and not a little alarmed, I returned even the small sum of money I had taken for travelling expenses, and faced the world without a penny or the immediate prospect of earning one. It was a sensation with which I was to become more or less familiar. But I had narrowly escaped an ignominious position, which would have increased a thousand-fold the difficulty of entering upon a new career. That was the aim of my colleagues.

Then came the painful desertion of all my late co-religionists. Even some to whom I was deeply attached wrote harsh and bitter letters to me; they were taught as a matter of religious duty to regard a secession in a moral light, and not as a change of convictions. Of the effect on the wider circle of acquaintances made in the course of ministry I have given one painful illustration, and will give another, as the truth is all but incredible. I knew what to expect, yet was loth to admit it myself without a struggle. So I singled out one layman of exceptional education and mature age, with whom I had been familiar for some time, and who, only two weeks previously, had spoken to me in terms of high esteem and affection. I wrote merely to ask him to suspend his judgment until I could send a full explanation of my action. He replied at once:—

“DEAR FATHER ANTONY,—I am deeply pained to find you have fled from the harvest field and become a scatterer—of what type remains to be seen. It is not for me to reproach you, Father Antony—the worm of conscience will do that efficiently, God knows—but it is necessary I should answer your last letter at once in order to prove my position and give no countenance to yours. You ask me to suspend judgment on you, which means that I should pass judgment on Father David forthwith and dub him slanderer, at the bidding of one who has obviously betrayed a sacred trust.

“With reference to your Upton sermon it is true I suggested its publication for the benefit of your mission. Unsuspicious of heterodoxy I failed at first to catch its true import, but quiet reflection afterwards revealed it to me as a subtle attack on Christianity itself, through the doctrine of evolution as applied to morals and religion.¹ How in the face of this you can still talk of your 'religious opinions' is inexplicable, surely? I can just conceive you as an agnostic with a shred of honesty remaining—but as any other odd fish—No! However it may be, God save you from the lowest depths of unbelief! We know too well the evolution of the apostate.

“Yet I desire to speak without bitterness [?] and shall think of you in sorrow only. If at any future time you think I can give you one helpful word, write to me, and believe me now to remain in simple truth, yours sincerely.”

The writer of this letter is considered to be unusually well informed in philosophical matters. I had, therefore, thought it possible that he would be able to regard my secession in an intellectual light. After such perverse misunderstanding and harsh and insulting language from him I was constrained to abandon all hope of sympathy from Catholics. Of the 3000 people of the congregation to which I was attached, as priest or student, for ten years, and from whom I experienced nothing but deep respect as long as I was with them, not a soul has ever written to relieve my distress with a single word of interest or concern. One only of them has spoken to me since my secession—one who stopped me in the street to ask “if I was not afraid that the ground would open under my feet.” One only of were orthodox. The writer it was who came to thank me for the sermon—a most unusual proceeding—and ask for its publication. He repeated his praise and his request twenty-four hours afterwards. It was a plea for the better education of the clergy, and, although it hit my own colleagues in a tender spot (and on that very account so much gratified the laity) they congratulated me on it without a word against its orthodoxy.

my late colleagues has ever written or said a sympathetic word to me. At the time of my secession he wrote me a letter in which the effect of the system is again visible, pitifully obscuring the kind and humane temper of the writer. It concluded:—

“And now having made my protest, let me say, my dear Father, that you were quite right in thinking that I am your sincere friend and brother. . . . You will never find any friends so true as the old ones [?], and it is to be regretted that you did not, in the dark hours of doubt and temptation, seek help from those whose prudence and experience might have saved you from wrecking your life by this false step. Vae soli. You did not have recourse to those whom you were bound to consult, but relied upon yourself; or, if you took counsel, it was rather with unbelievers than with those of the Faith and of the Order.¹

“You know well that other and greater intellects than yours have examined the same questions more deeply than you can possibly have done, and have come to an opposite conclusion” [the writer, as is usual, disregards the fact that, in this century, the number of authorities against him is equally high and brilliant, at least]; “and this ought to have made you distrust your own judgment, doubt the infallibility of your own lights, and feel there was much you have not been able to see, which, if you could see, would lead you the opposite way. I fear that this pride may have contributed to bring about the withdrawal of the light. What may also have helped is that bitterness of spirit you have sometimes manifested towards others, which is not according to the dictates of charity. Add to that a want of respect for those in authority, and you have the factors which may have helped to bring this chastisement from God. I do not judge you; you must know your own conscience, but I feel I ought to tell you what appears to me as likely to have been the cause of your misfortune. . . . As it is, I can only pray earnestly to God to give you light and grace to see the truth and submit to it, and to beg our Holy Father not to cast you off. . . . That shall be my constant prayer, and one that I confidently hope will sooner or later be heard.—Believe me, my dear Father, very sorrowfully, but very sincerely, yours in Christ.”

¹ The reader is already aware that both these statements are absolutely inaccurate. I never took counsel with an unbeliever, whereas for eight years I took counsel with the most competent friar we had, until his counsel was threadbare. But my correspondent, F. Bede, was disappointed that I had not consulted him. The reason was that, although I had and have the highest possible regard for his character, he had no knowledge whatever of science or philosophy.

Here, at last, a kindly and humane feeling reveals itself, but how hardly it struggles through the narrow bonds of the dogmatic sense! Like the preceding letter, but much less harshly, it persists in considering my action in a purely moral light. The writer cannot entertain the possibility of my being honestly compelled by my studies to secede; though he has since, I am glad to say, expressed an entirely just conception of my position. One curious effect of his dogmatic view is seen in his effort to sum up my faults—and he knew me well. My “pride” of judgment is, I trust, excusable; I was bound to form an opinion. The charge of disrespect to authority and sarcasm in intercourse with my fellows, which I must fully admit, will be understood in the light of preceding chapters. I confess that I have taken some complacency in my moral character after that summary of it by my advocatus diaboli. But it is pitiful to see that a clever, experienced, and humane priest can entertain the thought that a man will be damned eternally for such trivialities. His whole attitude is, as in the preceding case, a significant effect of the system; and it is only as effects and illustrations of that system that I offer these details about my secession.

It would be useless to describe all the incidents that arose at the separation; they were wearisome and painful repetitions of the same unfortunate spirit. During my clerical days I had attracted some suspicion by defending the possibility of honest secession from the Church, and especially of bonâ fide scepticism; it was now my turn to be sacrificed to the system which I had resented. It has been explained that the Church is prepared to go to any length to prevent scandal, and the recognition by the laity of an honourable secession of one of the clergy would be a serious scandal; hence little scruple is shown by priests in discussing the character of a former colleague. In my own case I believe that nothing very offensive has been invented.¹

¹ I must add, with reluctance, and only because it is a material fact in regard to the Roman system, that, as the years passed and I began to write critical works, the same vile calumnies were circulated about me by the clergy as about all other seceding priests. These things are carefully kept out of print, so that one has no legal remedy; but I have had inquiries about them from all parts of the English-speaking world. The chief and most flagrant aim is to connect my secession with my marriage. The Catholic layman will not trouble to glance at "Who's Who?" from which he would at once learn that I did not marry until three years and a

The favourite hypothesis seems to be that indiscreet flattery and premature honours have unfortunately deranged my intelligence—discipline, of course, requiring the usual excommunication and social ostracism. Those of my acquaintances who cannot convince themselves of my mental derangement are offered the grim alternative of regarding me as having “obviously betrayed a sacred trust” (to quote my former friend). Only my own immediate family circle and one other family, out of a wide circle of friends, seem to regard me still as a rational and honest human being. As far as I can gather, the majority of my earlier friends would have preferred me—whatever my frame of mind—to remain at their altars. There are many priests who do so.

Some such violent disruption from the past is the lot of every seceder from Rome. Add to it the practical difficulty of recommencing life in mature age, and some idea will be formed of one great force that helps to preserve the integrity of the Catholic priesthood.

half after my secession. I was unaware, until two years after I had left the Church, even of the existence of the lady whom I eventually married. The whole of these legends are remarkable for their absolutely reckless mendacity. Third edition.

CHAPTER XII

CRITIQUE OF MONASTICISM

BEFORE I proceed to summarise the information regarding monastic life which is dispersed through the preceding chapters, and to make it the ground of an opinion, it will be well to enlarge and supplement it as far as possible. However interesting these details may be in themselves, they would throw little light on the general condition of monasticism if it could be thought that they only illustrated the life of one particular order, and still less if they were due to the abnormal circumstances in which one small branch of that order chanced to find itself. On so narrow a base only a very restricted opinion could be reared. No fault, indeed, is more frequently committed by English and American writers on the Church of Rome than this of undue generalisation. It is often forgotten that the Roman Church in England is, after all, merely a large and active mission in a foreign land. Hence many writers fail to correct the insularity of their experience, and thus have not a due sense of the real proportions of sects and their institutions on the great world-stage. They likewise fail to make allowance for the peculiar effect of a missionary status. To escape this fallacy the preceding description of monasticism in England, illustrated copiously from the life of the Grey Friars, needs collateral support from other countries or national "provinces" of that order.

One other province has been described already at some length. The Belgian province, it must be remembered, is in an entirely different condition from the English province. It labours under no financial difficulties (the seven monasteries of the English friars bear a collective debt of about £50,000), it has no scarcity of vocations, it suffers not the slightest civic or legislative interference with its manner of life. It may be taken as a typical branch of modern monasticism, and is claimed to be such by its adherents. Yet although it differs considerably in literal fulfilment of the Franciscan rule, in formal discipline and ritual, it will be recognised from the contents of Chapter VII. that it agrees entirely with the English province in the features which are important to the philosophical observer. On the whole, its life is sordid and hypocritical.

A slight allusion has also been made to the condition of the Franciscan Order in Ireland. So unsatisfactory is it, from a monastic point of view, that the Roman authorities for many years were bent on extinguishing it. Ireland, one of the most Catholic countries in the civilised world, is the richest possible soil for monasticism; men who lead the lives of the medieval monks will receive from its peasantry the deep reverence and hospitality of the medieval world. Yet the Irish province was, at the time I left the Franciscan Order, one of its most enfeebled branches. During the years of persecution the scattered friars naturally discarded every monastic feature from their lives, and no amount of pressure from Rome had been able to reform them. They individually possessed money (thus ignoring the first principle of the Franciscan rule), wore boots and stockings, rarely donned their habits, had secular servants, and were guilty of many other condemned practices. But in the last few years the province has been restored to a moderate regularity, and is now a little better disciplined than the English province.

Another flourishing branch of the order is found in Holland. Although it is in an "heretical" country it has full civic liberty and is generously patronised; hence it has grown into a powerful body. During my sojourn in Belgium I gathered that it fell far short of the high standard of the Flemish province, and the fact seemed to be generally confirmed. But shortly after my return to England I received a curious confirmation of the opinion. We received a small pamphlet, written in Latin (for it was not intended to reach the eyes of the laity), having for its theme the condition of the Dutch Franciscan province. It was signed by a Dutch friar, who declared that he was (and had been for some years) incarcerated by his colleagues because he would not keep silence; he had written the pamphlet in his room of detention, and managed to have it conveyed to friends in the outer world. He declared that the province was deeply corrupted; that asceticism was almost unknown, and a gross sensualism pervaded their ranks—even mentioning isolated cases of friars being brought home to the monastery "theologically drunk," with the aid of police-stretchers. He further declared that the superiors of the monasteries bribed their provincial to overlook the state of things, and that the province secured tranquillity by sending large sums of money to the Roman authorities for their new international college. The pamphlet was clearly not the composition of an insane person, and none of our friars called its accuracy into question. It must be remembered that this pamphlet was written by a Franciscan priest solely for the perusal of other Franciscan priests. Again, therefore, we meet the same unfavourable moral and intellectual features, much more accentuated than even in the Irish province.

The other branches of the order are only known to me by conversation with isolated members. The circumstances of the friars in the United States are entirely similar to those of the English friars, and their condition is closely analogous, if not a little less ascetic. The South American friars, I gathered from one of them whom I knew, urgently needed reform. The friars of Spain are fairly well known since the opening up of the Spanish colonies to civilisation. The German provinces seem to be slightly better—a little more industrious and studious, as would be expected—but, on the whole, do not differ materially from their Belgian neighbours. The French friars were very little higher in the spiritual scale, as a rule, than the Belgians, taking into account the enormous difference of temperament. France will not be much the poorer for their loss. The Italian friars, as a rule, maintain a more rigorous discipline, and are less material than their northern brethren; but they are very generally idle, quarrelsome, ignorant, and ambitious of office. There are, it need hardly be said, fervent individual monks everywhere, and many fervent communities in Italy and Spain. For my purpose

I must give the broad features. I must say that, where the profession of asceticism is not a sham, it can point only to a mechanical and unspiritual discipline.

I have, in the ninth chapter, said enough about other religious orders to show that they are in an analogous condition. Where the rule of life is not very ascetical, it is observed; where, as in all the older orders, there is a profession of austerity, the practice is not in accord with the profession. It is hardly likely that Rome would tolerate an unusual corruption on the part of one particular order. In spite of the great diversity in their aims and characters, the same forces are at work in each. In fact, the various monastic congregations have so far lost sight of the special purposes for which they were founded that, especially in England and the United States, they differ from the ordinary clergy in little more than dress and community life and ceremonies. The orders which, like the Franciscan, were founded for the purpose of caring for the poor, and embodying voluntary poverty in their own lives, are found to be continually seeking a higher social level; vying with each other for the patronage of the rich, and always choosing a middle class in preference to a poor congregation. The Dominican order was intended to be an "Order of Friars Preachers," but it now has no more claim to that title than the other semi-monastic and semi-secular congregations. Carmelites, Servites, Marists, and Oblates were founded in order to increase the cult of the mother of Christ; Jesuits for the fight against heresy and the instruction of the young; Passionists to spread devotion to the Passion. In all of them the original object has dropped very much out of sight, and there is a very close resemblance of life and activity. It is said that there has been serious question at Rome of suppressing the majority of them, and reducing the number to about four, of different types, which would suffice for vocations of all complexions.

We are now in a position to answer with some degree of justice the often repeated question: What is the ethical significance and the ethical value of modern monasticism? The slightest reflection on the origin of the monastic bodies will make it clear that a high degree of spirituality and a keen faith in the supernatural are necessary in the earnest votary of monasticism. The orders have been founded by men of an abnormally neurotic and spiritual temperament, men who were capable of almost any ascetical excesses. Extraordinary actions were their ordinary stimulant, and they devoted themselves with ardour to that ascetical rigour of life which the Christian Church has, from the earliest stages, derived from the teaching of its founder. It is clear that Christ did lay great stress on the merit of self-denial; but it seems equally clear that he did not contemplate the system of eremitical and cenobitic life which commenced in the Thebaid a few centuries after his death, and which is still rigorously presented in the life of the Carthusians, and less rigorously in that of the Trappists. However that may be, St. Bernard, St. Bruno, St. Francis, St. Dominic, and the other founders, translated literally into their own lives, under the influence of an exceptionally fervid religious emotion, the principles of Christian ethics, as they were universally expounded up to the fifteenth century.

In an age when it was thought that one man could expiate the sins and purchase the pleasures of another, these saints became centres of great public interest and attracted many disciples. Then, in an evil hour, they drew up certain rules of life, which were only slightly modified versions of their own extraordinary lives, and bade their followers bind themselves by the most solemn and indissoluble obligation to their observance. Such rules could only be observed by men who shared the same exalted spiritual temper and imagination; and one needs little knowledge of life to understand how very scarce such men are, and how great an error it is to suppose that any large body of men would observe such rules with fidelity. In the Middle Ages faith was not overcast by scientific, historical, and philosophical controversies, and tradition was a paramount authority. Men were not only chronologically nearer to the great drama of the foundation of Christianity, but they accepted the traditional version with unquestioning confidence.

However, even in the Middle Ages, monasticism was no purer an institution than it is now. Soon after the foundation of the several orders there begins the long history of corruptions, reforms, and schisms inside the order, and of papal and episcopal fulminations and historical impeachments from without. Long before the death of Francis of Assisi his order was deeply corrupted; indeed, his own primitive companions had made him tear up, or had torn up for him, the first version of his rule, and it was only by the intrigue of certain patrons at Rome that he secured the papal assent to his second rule. And scarcely had the supreme command passed, during Francis's lifetime, into the hands of Fr. Elias, than a powerful party of moderates arose, and dissension, intrigue, and schism threw the entire body into a fever of agitation. Elias was a clever and ambitious friar, who had a much wider acquaintance with human nature and much less ascetical fervour than Francis. The manner of life which he advocated was, like that of modern monks, much more sensible; his error was, also like that of the moderns, to cling to the original profession. And that struggle of human nature against the unnatural standard of life it had somehow adopted has never ceased. The many branches of the Franciscan Order, Capuchins, Recollects, Reformed, Conventuals, and Observants, mark so many different schisms over the perpetual quarrel; yet, at the present day, they are all once more on a common level. And, apart from this internal evidence, secular history gives abundant proof of the periods of deep degradation into which the orders of monks have periodically fallen; if secular historians are not trusted, a judicious selection of papal decrees and episcopal letters would place the fact beyond controversy.

Hence it is only natural to expect that, in these days of less luminous and tranquil faith and less fervid imagination, the spirit of monasticism will be less potent than ever; the more so as a large section of Christianity has now repudiated the ascetical ideal entirely, and emphatically dissociated it from the teaching of Christ. Protestantism first fell upon monasticism, flail in hand, for its corruption, and nearly extinguished it; then it sought theological justification, and convinced itself that monasticism was unscriptural. Although there have been many vain attempts in modern days to reanimate it, the vast majority of non-Catholics persist in regarding monasticism as founded on an exegetical error and humanly unjustifiable; and that conviction, together with the causes that produced it or occasioned its formation, has re-acted on the old Church. The mental attitude which in former ages passed at once and instinctively from deep fervour to great ascetical rigour is rarely found to-day amongst educated people. Not only is faith less confident, but the growth of the moral sense has affected the tradition. It is now thought an unworthy conception of God that he should be held to look down with complacency on a race of "self-tormentors" and should promise rewards for the sacrifice of the gifts he has put before us. And the growing sense of the unity of human nature has made it no longer possible to suppose that we may enfeeble "the flesh" yet strengthen the spirit. Capacity for work is placed higher than bloodless debility. To face life manfully is held to be nobler than to shun it.

The description I have given of modern monastic life shows that all these changes of the spirit of the world have penetrated into the cloister. The idyllic life of the monk, a life of prayer and toil and unworldliness or other-worldliness, does not exist to any great extent outside the pages of Catholic apologists and a few non-Catholic poets and novelists. The forms of monasticism remain, but the spirit is almost gone from them. One is forcibly reminded of that passage of Carlyle where he speaks of institutions as fair masks under which, instead of fair faces, one catches a glimpse of shuddering corruption. Not that monasticism, apart from its high profession, is an object of special moral reprobation; its fault, its title to contempt, lies rather in its continued profession of an ideal from which it has hopelessly fallen, and in its constant effort to hide that discrepancy.

There are, of course, isolated members who are deeply corrupted in monasteries and nunneries, as in all other spheres; there are^e also many individuals of unusually exalted character. But the great majority of the inmates of monastic institutions may be divided, as is clear from the preceding, into two categories. One is the category of those who are religiously inclined, but whose whole merit consists in the equivocal virtue of having bound themselves to a certain system of religious services, through which they pass mechanically and with much resignation, and which they alleviate by as much harmless pleasure and distraction as they can procure. The other category, and, perhaps, the larger one, consists of those who seem to have exhausted their moral heroism in the taking of the vows; for the rest of their lives (and one of the most remarkable features of monks of all classes is the anxiety they show to prolong their "earthly exile") they chafe under the discipline they have undertaken, modify and withdraw from it as much as possible, and add to it as much "worldly" pleasure as circumstances permit. Both categories lead lives of ordinary morality—but only ordinary, so that the garments of the saints sit very incongruously on their shoulders. They seem to appreciate the good things of this life as keenly as ordinary mortals do, and shrink from death as naïvely as if death meant annihilation instead of entrance into Paradise.

Thus, on the one hand, certain anti-papal lecturers err in representing monasticism, as a body, as an institution of a particularly dark character; on the other hand, the belief of the average Catholic layman that it is an institution of unusual merit—that convents are “the lightning conductors of divine wrath from the cities,” &c.—is pitifully incorrect. Monasticism has suffered a luxurious overgrowth of sensuousness. This is partly due to the idleness, and partly to the vow of celibacy, of the monks. I have said enough of their idleness, which is one of the most constant features of their life in Catholic countries. Their religious ceremonies do not afford serious occupation of mind. They never undertake manual labour, and they study little. The amount of work they are entrusted with does not give occupation to half the community. Hence results much idleness; and idleness is, as St. Francis told them, “the devil’s pillow.”

Then there is the absence of contact (entire absence in Catholic countries) with the sex which is, by instinct and education, more refined, and exercises a refining influence. In the absence of that influence a natural masculine tendency to coarseness develops freely, unless it receives a check in deep spirituality, which cannot be said to be frequently the case. In point of fact, most of the founders of orders seem to have appreciated that influence very sensibly. St. Augustine, of course, in his saintly days, does not, for obvious reasons; but St. Benedict had his Scholastica,

St. Francis his Clare, St. Francis de Sales his Jeanne Françoise, and even the grim St. Peter of Alcantara had his Teresa. Their modern disciples have also many "spiritual" friendships, but the fact is unable to counterbalance the effect of their celibate home-life. Their intercourse with women, in the face of their ascetical teaching, is necessarily either very limited or hypocritical.

Thus it is that, wherever there is not deep piety, we find a selfish individualism, which is the root of all the undignified intrigue, meanness, and dissension that have been described. Thus it is also that there is a morbid craving for indulgence in food and drink, making a mockery of their long fasts and abstinences. In the midst of a long fast they will celebrate an accidental feast-day most luxuriously, and at the close of the fast have quite a gastronomic saturnalia. Still it must be said that, whilst there is more drinking than is supposed, there is little drunkenness. There is usually a constant and liberal supply of drink, if the convent is in good circumstances, but excess is rare; it is, however, not treated seriously unless it has become public.

A third effect of this pious exclusion of women is seen in the tone of their conversation; it is too frequently of an unpleasant character—not immoral, rarely suggestive, but often coarse and malodorous. Tales which the better class of Catholic laymen would not suffer to be told in their presence, and which are more fitting for such books as La Terre and L'Assommoir, are frequently told in clerical, and especially monastic, circles.

On the point of immorality in the specific sense I must endeavour to formulate an opinion. My experience has been wide, though not of long duration, so that I could not rebut an opposite and more damaging statement of experience. Yet I am convinced there has been much exaggeration in this respect. The evidence of the majority of "escaped" monks and nuns seems to me unreliable. But even if all their tales were true, it would only prove that, as everybody expects, there are many isolated cases of immorality. It is improper to extend the charge to the whole body. It can only be said that these cases are numerous. There can be nothing very startling in that statement. I have no doubt it would be less true of the clergy than of an ordinary body of men if their lives were healthier. But as long as they are indiscriminately and prematurely bound to celibacy, and to a life which is so productive of egoism, sensuousness, and indolence, it is the only possible condition for them.

The same must be said of the vow of celibacy of the secular clergy. In theory it is admirable for the ecclesiastical purpose, and it is very graceful to contemplate from the standpoint of Christian asceticism. In practice it is a deplorable blunder, and leads to much subterfuge and hypocrisy. Like monasticism, it would probably not be accepted by one-half their number if they were not involved in an irrevocable engagement to it before they properly understand it. Like monasticism, it will probably disappear, as a universal law, when the Church of Rome is awakened at length from her conservative lethargy with the din and roar of a great battle in her ears.

Finally, an answer is also ready to that other question which is not infrequently heard in these days: What is the relation of the monastic orders to Socialism? Socialising Christians, or Christian Socialists, frequently hold up the monastic orders as embodiments of a true social spirit. The argument rests, of course, on a very superficial analogy; there is really no parallel between monasticism and Socialism. On the contrary, they are at the very opposite poles of economics. Monasticism, in the first place (except the modified monasticism of the Jesuits), does not counsel a community of goods; neither in individual nor in common does it permit ownership. But it parts company with Socialism very emphatically when it goes on to impose extraordinary limits on production. Socialism urges a common use of the conveniences produced, and urges the production of as many as possible. And lest it should seem that monasticism at least sympathises with the Socialists of simpler life, such as Mr. E. Carpenter, it must be remembered that it limits production on an exactly opposite principle. Mr. Carpenter thinks simplicity conducive to comfort and happiness; monasticism trusts that it is productive of discomfort and mortification. In fine, it wishes its votaries to be uncomfortable in this world, which is the very antithesis of the Socialistic aim.

In a minor degree its celibacy is anti-socialistic; whatever relation of the sexes the Socialist may advocate, he certainly advocates some form of intimate relation. And the Socialist would not for a moment sanction the withdrawal of a large number of citizens from every civic duty on the plea that they were more interested in another world. He would not exempt a large number of able-bodied men from labour on the plea that they were "waterspouts of divine grace" or "lightning conductors of divine wrath" for their sinful brethren. He would be impatient of all indolence, and mendicancy, and parasitism of any complexion.

However, the parallel has never been very seriously entertained, and does not merit further criticism. Monasticism has neither interest nor advantage for the modern world; it is an enfeebled and corrupted survival of an institution whose congenial environment seems to have disappeared, and it is only maintained by the scandalous practice of enticing or permitting boys to undertake life-long obligations of a most serious character. Even in the stern monasteries of the Carthusians, where it still retains its full rigour of ascetism and solitude, it loses the sympathy of the modern world; merit is now thought to consist in the fulfilment of the whole duty of man, in works that produce visible fruit, and that tend to remove the actual evils of life. But, for the majority of the monastic bodies, with their indolent withdrawal from life's difficulties and duties, without any real compensating virtue, or with their pitiful compromise between external occupation and their antiquated theories of detachment, one cannot but feel a certain contempt. At the best, a monk would merely have the merit of making himself a part of a great penitential machine. As it is, his profession of extraordinary virtue and unworldliness is an insincere formality.

CHAPTER XIII

THE CHURCH OF ROME

THERE is at the present time a profound struggle in progress over fundamental religious questions. During three centuries Europe has resounded with the din, and even been watered with the blood, of conflicting sects. At length the sections of Christianity have been distracted from their civil war by the advent of a common enemy—anti-sacerdotalism, if not a yet more revolutionary force that has been called naturalism—and they are eager to unite under a common banner against it. No one who is at all familiar with modern literature can ignore that struggle. During the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries the number of powerful writers and thinkers who have withstood the traditional religious authority in England, France, and Germany, is deeply significant. There is in our day a comparative lull in the storm of controversy—a comparative dearth of eminent thinkers on both sides—but one still finds unmistakable traces of the conflict in every page of every branch of literature. A great number of influential writers advocate one or other form of naturalism; it is hardly too much to say that the greater number of the eminent exponents of literature, science, and art depart in some measure from the orthodox path. It is usually said that women are the more reliable support of clericalism. We have at the present day in England a number of brilliant women writers, but though few of them (for reasons which may be left to the psychologist) profess extreme naturalism, very few of them adhere strictly to the orthodox sacerdotal institutions. The issue of the struggle is, therefore, the object of much anxious speculation.

The place which the Church of Rome is destined to occupy in this struggle is a matter of much interest, and it is usually expected that it will be a very prominent position. The Church itself, of course, with that buoyant confidence which is one of the most patent symptoms of its "perennial youth," predicts the ultimate absorption of all other forms of Christianity into itself, and proclaims that the final conflict will be between Rome and Rationalism. And Roman Catholics boast, with much truth, that their prediction is confirmed by many independent observers; Macaulay's vision of the undying glory of the Papacy rising through the mists of future ages over the ruins of England (and, presumably, Anglicanism) finds many sympathisers. Mr. H. G. Wells has lent the force of his expert prophetic faculty recently to the "anticipation" that Catholicism will outlive Protestantism.

But it is not usually noticed that there is a great difference in the ground of the prediction in the two cases. Rome prides herself on the intellectual value of her credentials, and thinks that time is sure to bring about their universal acceptance. On the other hand, those non-Catholic writers who talk of an ultimate struggle between Rome and Rationalism are under the impression that Rome does not appeal to reason at all. They divide men into two categories—rational and extra-rational—and think that the final trial of strength will be between reason and authority, which they identify with Rome. There is a curious misunderstanding on both sides. Roman theologians perversely represent Rationalists as men who reject mysteries, miracles, &c., on the mere ground that they are supra-rational, and without reference to their credentials; and most Rationalists are under the impression that Rome professes an irrational method, rebukes and demands the blind submission of reason, instead of offering it satisfactory evidence, and preaches authority from first to last. Under that impression it is not surprising that the Church of Rome is selected as the fittest to survive of the Christian sects. But the impression is wrong.

Just as the Rationalist does not reject supra-rational theorems if they are not contra-rational, and if there is satisfactory evidence in their favour, so neither does the theologian reject the demands of reason for logical satisfaction. The Catholic scheme claims to be pre-eminently logical, and does precisely appeal to the intellect of the inquirer; indeed, it is taught that the "convert" from Rationalism must have a natural rational certitude before he can receive the "light of faith." The system has been described in an earlier chapter, but the process would be of this character. The inquirer (if beginning from scepticism) would be offered rational evidence of the existence and personality of God, and (usually, though not necessarily) of the immortality of the soul; if that evidence did not satisfy him there would be no further progress. If convinced on those points he would be offered evidence, still of a purely rational character, of the divinity of Christ and Christianity, and of the authenticity of the Scriptures. Then he would be led, on historical grounds, to accept the divine institution of the Church of Rome, its infallible magisterium and its indispensable ministerium, and the prerogatives of its supreme pastor. He is now prepared to accept statements, logically, on authority, and the rest of the dogmas are, consequently, proved from Scripture, tradition, and the authority of the Church.

But even here reason is not abandoned; not only is it continually sought to confirm statements by rational and historical analogies, but it is admitted as a principle that every dogma must meet the negative test of reason. If any dogma contains a single proposition which offends against reason the whole system must be rejected. That is the teaching of the Church. Hence much ingenuity is shown in averting the rationalistic criticism of such thorny dogmas as the Trinity and the Eucharist; it is claimed that the accusation of absurdity is disproved, and therefore reason may confidently take them on authority. And again, when it is said that there is a living infallible magisterium in the Church, this must be accepted in a very narrow sense. The overwhelming majority of the bulls, decrees, encyclicals, &c., which the Popes have issued, have only a disciplinary effect. It is piously believed by many that Providence takes a minor interest in them; but most priests take little notice of them, and the doctrine of infallibility has been carefully drawn up not to include them. The great dogma simply amounts to this, that the Pope (or the Church) can teach no new doctrine, but he has special guidance in his solemn declarations (which are few and far between) that certain doctrines are contained in the deposit of revelation. There have only been two such definitions in the nineteenth century. Neither Leo XIII. nor Pius X. has given any. Hence it will be understood how great an error those Protestants make who go over to Rome for the sake of its infallible voice (as if they were to have an infallible Times at breakfast every morning), and also how untrue it is that Rome is the antithesis, the professed opponent, of reason, and only preaches submission.

No, the Church of Rome does not profess to be the refuge of the timid and the sentimental in a subversive age. Its strength must be sought in its distinctive methods and institutions, not in a position that would make it the centre of all forces opposed to Rationalism. These advantages have been described in the course of my narrative. In the first place, it has a very superior organisation to that of any other Christian sect, or any other religion whatever. Its constitution embodies all the several advantages of an elective monarchy and an oligarchy (indeed canonists dispute whether it is to be called monarchic or oligarchic); and at the same time it escapes the instability incident on democratic forms by dogmatically dissociating its power from the civil power and claiming a supernatural source for it. Its hierarchy, of which the centre is a figure about whom a vague supernatural halo is set, and who is now always a commanding and venerable personage, lends a rigid unity to its 200,000,000 adherents. Rome, the heir of the tact, ambition, and vigour of the Cæsars, the richest treasury of art, and a veritable hive of lawyers and diplomatists, controls and utilises the talent, the ambition, and the jealousy of its great sacerdotal army, and with easy confidence commands the attention of the civilised world.

Then the completeness, the unity, and the plausibility of its theological system must be considered. From the days of St. John Damascene until the sixteenth century almost all the talent of the civilised world has contributed to the formation of that system; it is a truism to say that it is plausible. Enduring almost unchanged through ten centuries, and eliciting the veneration of almost the entire intellectual world, it presents an imposing contrast to the theologies of more recent growth. Moreover, even in recent times it has been accepted by many great writers who have left the impress of their genius upon it, and accommodated it to minds of every cast.

And side by side with the elaboration of its own system must be classed an instrument which it uses very adroitly for the same purpose, the Index Expurgatorius, or list of condemned books. In England and America there is little explicit mention of the Index, for economical reasons, but every Catholic is given very clearly to understand the depravity of reading books "against faith or morals." The restriction is cleverly represented to be a moral, not a disciplinary prescription, and thus the end of the Index is practically achieved without mentioning the odious word. Non-Catholics are gravely reminded that it is ethically imperative to study both sides of every religious question. Catholics are told in the same breath that it is sinful for them to read the works of opponents, because they are already in possession of the truth and must not run the risk of losing it.

At the same time Catholics are indulged to some extent in their wayward anxiety to know what opponents are saying by having their objections formulated for them in their own apologetical literature—with satisfactory solutions appended. Here again the peculiarity of the Catholic controversial method tells in its immediate favour. As one would expect, most of the objections have been carefully prepared for the express purpose of refutation. No Catholic writer ever gives an accurate version of hostile criticism. Newman is usually said to be the most satisfactory in this respect. In fact it is claimed that he formulates the opinion of an adversary more lucidly than the original writer. But take, for instance, the exposition of Gibbon's five causes of the spread of Christianity in the appendix to the "Grammar of Assent" and compare it with the classical chapter of Gibbon. It is utterly inaccurate and unworthy. And not only are the opinions of critics garbled and mutilated, but their personal characters are too lightly aspersed. Anglicans are allowed some precarious hope of ultimate salvation. But when we come to deeper sceptics the credit of bona fides is stopped. All the theological manuals grossly affirm that there is no such thing as honest agnosticism, and it is firm Catholic doctrine that none but a believer in personal theism can ever enter heaven. Thus the most puerile stories—as that Julian died crying out, "Vicisti, Galilæe," and that Voltaire died raving for a priest, and so on—are generally accepted; and the most dishonourable motives are imputed to the enemies of the Church. If a modern Inferno were written it would describe a brilliant literary circle.

So also the results of philosophical, historical, and scientific research are accommodated to pious purposes. For several years geology and palæontology suffered great torture at the hands of Genesiac interpreters; history and archæology and philology then yielded marvellously convenient results; ethnology was racked to support a biblical chronology which is now abandoned; even chemistry, embryology, psychophysics, and a host of innocent sciences were pressed into service and pressed out of shape in the process.

Of another institution which the Church formerly used for the same high purpose of guarding its flock against intellectual wolves—the Inquisition—little need be said. If it were truly a dead and discarded proceeding, like persecution on the Protestant side, it would not merit notice; it seems unprofitable to reproach the Church of Rome continually with the many and dark sins of the past of which it has really repented. However, it is not at all clear that the Church has repented of this particular outrage upon morals and humanity. The principles on which the Inquisition was founded are still part of the Church's teaching; and if it were possible to conceive a return of the ecclesiastical supremacy of former days, there is little doubt that the same policy would be urged. Happily for many of us, civil governments are becoming more and more reluctant to be guided by ecclesiastical principles and wishes in the discharge of their function to the community. Logical and candid writers like Dr. Ward admit this. It is said that he found Huxley once examining his premises, and was asked by him "where he kept his stake for heretics!"

A second great source of strength in the Roman Church is its impressive use of æsthetic agencies. The subject has been treated already, and hardly needs to be enlarged on. In Protestant countries, where the reaction against Roman corruption has reduced the worship to a state of spiritual nudity, this attraction of the Catholic services is very powerful. A comparison of the percentage of converts in various parishes with the sensuous attractiveness of their services would yield interesting results.

Other forces which are peculiarly at work in the Church of Rome can only be briefly mentioned. Its vast and imposing diplomatic body of legates, &c., and its incessant political intrigue, have no parallel in any other religion; nor has the great wealth it gathers every year by means of an organised collection throughout the world. Owing to its profound antiquity and its comprehensive range it can enumerate a long series of humanitarian works which have been done by men who happened to be ecclesiastics; these become an imposing record of the Church's wondrous benefits to humanity in art, science, sociology, and philanthropy. So even in ethics the Church of Rome professes a more effective promotion of the welfare of humanity than other Churches, though in this department its claim of special power does not seem difficult to impugn on the test of fruits.

Such would seem to be the peculiar strength of the Church of Rome in the religious struggle, as distinguished from all other Christian sects. The influences at work for its extension and consolidation are undoubtedly effective, but side by side with them it has many characteristic weaknesses which seem to give less assurance of its fabled immortality. In the first place, seeing that it does not shrink from and repudiate the rational criterion which the new-born age is applying to every existing institution, its very vastness is a source of danger; it presents a broader front to the keen rationalistic attack. If the mysterious dogmas which are common to all Christian sects invite criticism, nothing is gained in point of security by adding to them that microcosm of miracles—Transubstantiation—or the seven sacraments, or the vaguely floating tradition of an Immaculate Conception. Then, too, the Church of Rome is so dogmatic in its teaching, and has so frequently to abandon very positive positions. In other sects the privilege of private judgment and the absence of an authoritative magisterium give greater elasticity under hostile pressure.

Again the ideal of a higher life which the Church of Rome puts forward brings it into conflict with modern moralists. Self-torment will never again be recognised by the world at large as the supreme virtue, yet the saints of the Roman calendar are honoured principally for that practice. One of the most recent models that the Church has raised up for the veneration of humanity, Benedict Joseph Labre, shows the exemplary record of having avoided labour and lived by mendicancy, and having deliberately cultivated the most filthy habits. Usefulness to humanity is now held to be the highest virtue, and the Church pays little heed to that in canonisation. In fact, the very essence of its ethical teaching is entirely at variance with modern views. It teaches conformity with an external standard (about which there are innumerable controversies) and this for the sake of conciliating a Supreme Being and escaping his presumed vindictiveness. There is a growing tendency to regard actions that spring from such motives as non-ethical.

In fine, the very methods from which its strength is now derived will one day prove grievous sources of offence, for the simple reason that they are inconsistent with its real function as a purely religious organism. Diplomatic intrigue and the exercise of a purely temporal power may serve for the moment to extend and strengthen its influence; but they are agencies of a very questionable character in the hands of a spiritual body, and have more than once inspired an effective protest against Rome. And it need hardly be said that its literary exclusiveness, its Index, its tyranny, its wilful calumny of great opponents and distortion of their criticisms, are very vulnerable parts of its system. As yet they are effective methods of preserving the integrity of the Church. But in the better educated nations they are already being discarded. Laymen are now taking the polemical work on their own shoulders, and interpreting the strictures of theologians at their own discretion. The result will be an impatient rejection of the literary restrictions which have so long insulted their intelligence and moral courage.

Such, then, are the strength and the weakness respectively of the Church of Rome in the present stage of its conflict. During its protracted existence it has encountered and triumphed over many kinds of opposition. It emerged victorious from its secular struggle with polytheistic Rome and with the destructive neo-Hellenism of Alexandria; it met confidently and rose upon the flood of barbarism that poured out over Southern Europe; it guided its fortunes safely through the age of iron that followed, and then controlled the fierce intellectual activity of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries; it subdued and repressed the Renaissance and almost compensated its losses in the great Reformation. But the Church has never had so varied and so powerful a host of adversaries to encounter as it has at the present day. Apart altogether from the rival Christian sects—and in point of fact these seem more disposed to friendly alliance with it than to a continued conflict—the number of opposing forces of every character, intellectual, ethical, political, and æsthetical, is a matter of grave consideration.

In the first place, there is Rationalism—taking the term in its broad sense so as to include not only “naturalism,” but also that attenuated theism which rejects orthodox Christianity in virtue of the results of the Higher Criticism. In that sense the term does not designate a single and homogeneous system, but a huge collection of distinct and militant bodies—Materialism, Agnosticism, Positivism, Pantheism, Secularism, Theism, and Unitarianism. They may all be safely grouped under the banner of anti-sacerdotalism, and described as a formidable intellectual movement directed against orthodox Christianity in general and the Church of Rome in particular, the most dogmatic, conservative, and unyielding section of Christianity, led by the most powerful and most skilfully organised priesthood the world has ever seen. Non-Catholic sects have no stereotyped profession; they yield and adapt themselves to pressure, as is so well illustrated in Mr. Mallock’s “New Republic.” The revolutionary movement finds its chief antagonist in the Church of Rome, which wages with it apparently a guerre à outrance. How extensive that movement is—embracing, as it does, all who accept the results of philosophical, scientific, historical, and biblical criticism—and how powerfully represented in every branch of literature, is too well known and too frequently pointed out by clerical writers themselves to need enlarging upon.

Then there is a distinctively modern force of an ethical character which militates against the authority of the Church. In the United States, England, and Germany especially, a number of Ethical Societies have been founded and propagated with much zeal. They do not profess hostility to ecclesiastical institutions, but the mere fact that they advocate the transference of ethical life to a non-theological basis marks them out as enemies. The Church of Rome, in particular, regards herself as the only effective guardian of morality, and the ethical function of its priests is their most prominent service. It will never submit to the transfer of ethical interests to a secular institution; otherwise it would be reduced to the condition of the Greek or Roman priesthood—a condition which would not last long in modern times. Yet the Ethical Societies rapidly grow in importance.

In the political world the Church has met with harsh treatment from time immemorial, and its own diplomatic power has grown keen in the long contest. But the political anti-clerical movement of modern times is in a very different position from the violent movements of that character which are dispersed throughout history. Until the last century the anti-clerical politician or diplomatist had no great anti-theological system to fall back upon. Now, the large body who are ever ready to spring up in reaction against the Church's political encroachments have a powerful philosophy to appeal to. Formerly the Church's troubles generally came from a few sceptical individuals; now they spring from large political bodies, such as the Liberals of Spain and Belgium, the Libres-Penseurs of France, and the Freemasons of Italy. To the same great force must be added (from the present point of view) a new and anxiously regarded power—Socialism. The Church is very sensible of approaching danger from this quarter; and therefore, instead of its traditional practice of fiercely opposing every new movement, we find it attempting a compromise by patronising "Christian Socialism." This sociological force does not spend much time in discussing the Church's credentials. The thinkers of the modern world, it says, are fairly divided about the religious problem, and that problem has, under their attentions, assumed portentous dimensions; hence we busy people must be content with a mild scepticism, and if the Church crosses our path in reforming this world so much the worse for it.

A fourth influence of a less tangible and definable character may be set down under the head of Erotism. It may be thought that this is no new danger, but the world-old revolt of human nature against Christian ethics. But there are two considerations which make that influence present rather a new aspect. The first is the enfeeblement of the popular faith in the supernatural. The fourteenth, fifteenth, and eighteenth centuries were marked by great outbreaks of that influence, or by the spread of public immorality; but a keen faith still lurked in the popular mind, and the Church could successfully appeal to it. A Savonarola could meet and stem a veritable tide of Hellenism. In the present division of the world of thought, and seeing the imposing opposition to ecclesiastical teaching, that simple faith must be, and is, deeply affected; and erotism gains proportionately in power and stability. The second consideration is that this erotism, or revolt against traditional ethics, has become speculative and ratiocinative, and seeks to organise its votaries and systematise its protest. What is called literary decadence is, perhaps, midway between practical and organised immorality; it is a great literary power, very widespread in France, and on the increase in England and Germany. The free-love movement has also assumed important proportions, and counts some eminent literary exponents. There is, further, an æsthetic and Hellenistic school which will prove a serious adversary of traditional ethics. In practice it adheres to a severe Puritanism; in theory it is revolutionary. It cherishes the higher Greek ideal of love (as found in Plato); venerates the writings of Whitman, Nietzsche, and Carpenter; has all the fervour of youth and the fanaticism of ascetics.

Such are the forces which the Church of Rome finds opposed to it at the beginning of the twentieth century. I hesitate to enter on the path of prophecy, but a few observations may be offered as to the direction in which we may seek development. In the first place, I wholly dissent from Mr. H. G. Wells when he anticipates "a great revival of Catholicism," and thinks it will outlive Protestantism. The Protestant or Puritan religious temperament is as natural and enduring as the Catholic or Ritualist. I do not believe either will survive the other, though the Protestant sects are likely to relax the sternness of their exclusion of the ministry of art from the temple. And from what I have already said in this chapter it will be clear that I do not accept the current rationalistic feeling that Rome will survive because of its doctrine of authority.

But so shrewd and informed an observer as Mr. Wells has probably built on existing movements rather than on theories, and here, it seems to me, he has really even less support. There is every indication that the Church of Rome has reached, and is already falling away from, its high-water mark. Germany is perhaps the only country where the Church has made genuine progress in the last few decades¹; and against this must be put the "away from Rome" movement in Austria, the secession of many hundreds of priests and a corresponding number of the laity to the evangelical movement in France, and heavy losses in the industrial northern provinces of Italy and Spain and all over Belgium. But observers are misled chiefly by the apparent advance of Roman Catholicism in the English-speaking world. One might almost dismiss that phenomenon with one word—the Irish dispersion. The population of Ireland should be to-day, if it had had a normal growth, about 17,000,000. It is actually less than four millions and a half. The missing twelve millions, mostly Roman Catholics, are in England, Australia, and the United States. If the Roman ¹ Again I must make a correction; and it is singular to note that, wherever I erred in the first edition, I erred in favour of the Church. I have shown in my "Decay of the Church of Rome" that it is, on the confession of its own clergy, losing ground all over the world. It has lost a hundred million followers in a hundred years.

Third edition.

Church in England had retained the population it had at the beginning of the nineteenth century, as well as the million of Irish immigrants, it should have to-day, apart from any conversions, about 2,500,000 souls. I have proved (National Review, August 1901) that it has not more than 1,250,000. In other words, its losses are enormously larger than its gains. What I have said of Catholicism in London and the provinces will confirm this. I will add one other illustration. There is a long strip of the Lancashire coast called the Fylde which curiously retained the faith down to the nineteenth century. But I was told a few years ago by a priest who has worked for years in that district that the old Catholic families are falling away to-day in a remarkable manner. The last census taken in Australia pointed to a distinct decrease of Catholicism in that country. Recent inquiries in New York have put that city on a level with London; against the great parade of wealthy converts must be put immense losses amongst the poor Irish and their descendants. The overwhelming majority of the 12,000,000 Irish who are missing from their country to-day are in the United States; and they have made mixed marriages, under the usual stringent conditions, on every side. To these must be added a great immigration of Italian and German Catholics. With these elements the apparent growth of Catholicism in the States is easily explained. I will add one further observation on Catholicism in France. It is acknowledged that French men do not favour the Church. But when we remember that the Church forbids the use of contraceptives under pain of mortal sin, and then find the French population so long nearly stationary, and learn that there are in France only some 200,000 women with more than six children, we are forced to question the authority of the Church even over the women. Thus on patient consideration of the condition of each country the proud Catholic claim of having 250,000,000 followers collapses like an inflated bladder. The area of the Church's influence is shrinking yearly.

In former ages it compensated home losses by missionary conquests; its actual paltry missionary profits are little more than financial transactions. I have spoken with missionaries from every one of the great fields, and they all confirm the opinion. On public platforms, of course, they deliver optimistic speeches, at the end of which a collection is made; but in the genial atmosphere of the sitting-room afterwards they unbend, and unequivocally represent "conversions" of natives as money matters.

And when we turn to consider the movements of thought within the Church we seem to have another indication of the coming development. If we cannot admit either that Catholicism will in time absorb its rivals, or will itself be superseded by them, there is only one alternative. Its distinctive features will gradually disappear, its rigid walls will crumble away, until at length it pours its historic stream of spiritual effort into the broad unsectarian spirit of a later day. By its distinctive features I do not understand the famous "four notes of the true Church—unity, holiness, universality, and apostolicity"—which are in no sense distinctive of the Church of Rome to-day. Its characteristics are rather—asceticism, excessive dogmatism, elaborate ritual, and the Papacy. It seems to me that these features are visibly altering, and that we may confidently look forward to their complete disappearance or transformation.

If one thing may be claimed to be established in the preceding chapters it is that the ascetic spirit is rapidly decaying in the Church of Rome. Here and there a group of Carthusian monks¹ cling more or less to the medieval idea, but throughout the monastic world generally voluntary austerities are no longer practised, and the austerities enjoined by rule are evaded, or compensated, as much as possible. When this is true of the monks it is superfluous to discuss the laity. The law of abstinence from flesh-meat on certain days, the only ascetic practice now imposed on them, is relaxing year by year. Before the century is out Rome, too, will have quietly abandoned the ascetic ideal. The decay of the dogmatic feeling amongst Roman Catholics is less patent, but hardly less real. Beneath the outward uniformity, which the Vatican is still able to exact or to persuade, there is the same difference of thought and feeling as in every other sect. A considerable number of cases have lately come to my knowledge of priests who are quite as liberal as Dr. Mivart; in some cases as sceptical as myself. They intend to remain in the Church, and work for the removal of the emphasis from belief to conduct. The twentieth century will witness most considerable modifications in this respect. As the

Catholic ritual is only the artistic presentment of its doctrines some changes in this are bound to ensue, but—as we see so well in the decay of the old Roman religion—forms and ceremonies may long survive the beliefs that originally inspired them. There will also be a ritual advance in the other Christian Churches, so that here, too, the distinguishing feature tends to disappear. Before many decades Latin will cease to be the universal liturgical language; though in such forms as the mass—a symbolic sacrifice which the people only witness—it may remain indefinitely. And the Papacy will be proportionately modified. In the coming age of increasing centralisation and organisation it is not at all likely that the Roman Catholics will part with their magnificent polity. But the Vatican will see strange changes. For a time the æsthetic sense will persuade the new Catholicism to tolerate the glitter and the stage-lightning of the papal court. But it will gradually approximate to the model of the actual Free Church organisation. The president of the Church Catholic in the year 2000 will have as little resemblance to Leo XIII. in his Sedia gestatoria as the president of the German Republic of that date will have to William II.

To conclude by borrowing a fine metaphor from Mr. Wells; it would be hazardous to say when the Catholics may be expected finally to extinguish the sectarian lantern by which they have so long guided the steps of men. The day is fast breaking, and one by one the old lights will disappear. But if our social evolution is to be unequal—if we are content to leave vast areas such as the workers, or women, in mental obscurity—Catholicism may last indefinitely. If the new light is to penetrate to every part of our social structure, it cannot be many centuries before the last faint flicker of the historic lamp will die out, nay, will even be voluntarily extinguished in the blaze of the coming day.
